Bonanza, Delta Western ready to cry "Uncle"

By Sandra L. Medearis

A high-stakes public relations and business deal that brought fuel to Nome in a Russian tanker and caused one fuel distributor's boss to tender his resignation may be winding down after two years' court filings.

Bonanza Fuel, Inc., a Nome retail fuel distributor, filed a court claim in early 2012 against Delta Western seeking $1.5 million for higher fuel transportation costs after the marine transport company failed to deliver winter fuel in November 2011. Bonanza said DW, by standing them up at the fuel docks, hiked Bonanza's cost to top winter retail fuel supplies.

Bonanza had to retain Vitus Marine of Anchorage to deliver the fuel in a dramatic break through more than 300 miles of sea ice.

On Dec. 26, Delta filed a notice in U.S. District Court that a settlement had been reached with Bonanza subject to completing additional documents within 45 days. Terms of the agreement are not yet available.

DW maintains that foul weather Nov. 8-10 in 2011, followed by a cold snap that froze sea-lanes, shut out the barge delivery.

Further more, DW contends, they tried to make amends by also seeking another tanker, but that Bonanza jumped the gun with Vitus Marine.

Vitus Marine leased a Russian tanker with an ice-resistant hull, loaded fuel in Asia and Dutch Harbor and headed through the ice behind USCG icebreaker Healy.

Local and national politicians as well as USCG Commandant Adm. Robert Papp applauded the delivery as a means to demonstrate U.S. Coast Guard's need for more icebreakers and an expanded USCG presence in Western Alaska waters.

Any agency that could hang a business card on the event did, to take advantage of the ongoing media banquet, including a drone developer from University of Alaska who sent his craft aloft to assist the sophisticated military, federal and state weather instruments in evaluating the ice cover.

Throughout the two-years since Bonanza filed the case, Delta Western has maintained that a November storm and the Nome harbor's freeze cut off the delivery.

DW claimed that force majeure, an "act of God", excused DW from the failure to deliver in early November, and while DW looked for other means to keep its word, Bonanza went behind the company's back to make new arrangements with Vitus Marine, Inc., an Anchorage-based marine transport company.

Bonanza countered that DW recalled a barge with Bonanza's fuel mid-cruise to make a more lucrative continued on page 5

Graphite One exploring graphite deposit near Imruk Basin

By Diana Haecker

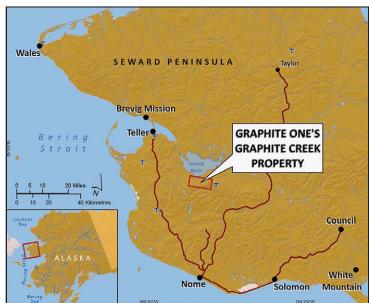

A Canadian based exploration company by the name of Graphite One Resources Inc. has been exploring a graphite deposit at the northern flank of the Kigluaik Mountain Range, near the Imruk Basin.

According to the company's Vice President of Exploration Dean Besserer, the project is still in the exploration phase. Besserer said it's too early to talk about the particulars of a mining plan or method when the resource has yet to prove up.

This year, Besserer said in an email correspondence with The Nome Nugget, the company initiated environmental monitoring in conjunction with recommendations from consultants and the Alaska Dept. of Natural Resources Large Mine Permitting Team.

"At this point, the deposit is very large with respect to flake graphite (the biggest in North America in fact)," wrote Besserer. "Until we know the economics of the deposit we won't be able to determine the life of the mine. Should it get into production it could be significant."

Besserer described that, in general, graphite operations are small operations that mine seasonally. "Usually the rock is mined and the graphite is liberated by a simple

Dear Editor:

Just received the Dec. 19th Nome Nugget, so expect by now many folks in Nome had info on the "Look at the Past" photo. This view of Marks Air Force Base (now the Nome Airport) was taken by the Air Transport Command on 12/10, sometime during WW11. I believe that the last remaining structure in this photo was the "Old Birchwood Hangar" that was demolished in the mid-1980s. Nome was the last stop on the Russian Lend-Lease route, and from 1942 until Sept. 1945, Russian pilots flew 7,983 P39 fighters, A20 and B25 bombers, C47s, and other aircraft from Nome to Siberia. Dear Nome Nugget Editor

This is an open letter to Sitnasuak shareholders asking for support for the Hobson Creek Hatchery. The hatchery has been on SNC land since 1999. It is a proven success.

We are asking Sitnasuak for a long-term lease. The state requires that we have a long-term lease for expanded operations.

My parents, Tommy and Myrtle Johnson, were founding members of Nome Fishermen's Association in 1993 shortly after the CDQ program came along. We helped develop the salmon plan for this region. I am now a board member following in my parents' footsteps.

My mother was one of the five incorporators of Sitnasuak Native Corporation. I am a shareholder and so are her grandchildren. She believed in fishing. She held a Norton Sound commercial salmon permit, which I inherited. She fished commercially and for subsistence from Cape Nome to Golovin Bay.

Since the early 1980s, our salmon stocks haven't been strong enough for commercial fishing and barely good enough for subsistence. A lot of families used to depend on subsistence fishing. In my life, I have seen it go from racks full of fish to where the racks have rotted and fallen down through lack of use. We need more fish and the Hobson Creek Hatchery can supply them. We've wasted too much time talk-

The Sitnasuak land committee will be meeting on our lease January 8, 2014 at 1 PM in the Sitnasuak boardroom on the second floor of the SNC building.

I invite all concerned shareholders to attend and voice your opinions and hopefully their decision will be to the benefit of all. Jackie Johnson

Alaska "fundamentally on wrong track" on rural law enforcement Bipartisan ILOC conference slams Parnell Administration record on law enforcement, tribal sovereignty

By Zack Fields

Communications Director Alaska Democratic Party

Wednesday, December 4 in Anchorage the bipartisan Indian Law and Order Commission slammed the Parnell Administration's record on rural law enforcement, saying that Alaska is "fundamentally on the wrong track." The ILOC recommended strengthening tribal sovereignty as a means to reduce violence in rural areas, but the Parnell Administration responded with a lengthy letter that said "we disagree with the means you suggest to accomplish that goal" of reducing violence.

"We think Alaska is fundamentally on the wrong track with how it deals with Alaska Natives, with an issue so important as sovereignty and self-determination," said ILOC Chairman Troy Eid, a Republican and former United States Attorney appointed by George W. Bush. "I would hold my conservative credentials to Attorney General Geraghty's of the governor' anytime," Eid said yesterday as he criticized the Parnell record.

The Indian Law and Order Commission was established by Congress in 2010 with legislation supported by the Alaska delegation. In its recently-issued report, ILOC said Alaska has the highest rates of domestic and sexual violence while tribal governments have the least ability to address those crimes locally. The Commission characterized the lack of tribal sovereignty as "indefensibly expensive to all Alaskans in terms of the human and eco-

Timber! Let's clear cut the phone trees

One of the most misguided concepts of efficiency is the phone tree. Espanole press #1; in English press #2; to speak with blah, blah press #3 and on and on and on. One wonders if they actually can hear the profanity when none of the options are what we want and it cycles back to square one.

Phone trees are one of the high tech advances that drive us screaming into madness when we have to listen to that dreadful music only to be interrupted by that mechanical voice that says it will be 15 minutes before we can talk to a person. One of the evil twins of the phone tree is the message phone that says this message phone is full, goodbye. Try calling a Norton Sound Hospital administrator and hear how their phones fail to take a message. Lord help us if we need to talk with a real person. Of course, not to be outdone are the officers at the Nome Police Department who seldom return a voice mail phone call. Not to be ignored is the annoying robo-call that always hits during the dinner hour. "Please stay on the line for an important message." How fast can we hang up? What expletives are released as we slam down the phone? Is this a way to win votes?

This world would be so much nicer if we could communicate on a more personal level without voice mail, robo-calls, or phone trees. Of course we could maintain a hearty sense of humor by having a ringoff contest to see who has the most obnoxious phone tree in Nome. Send us a letter. Don't call. Happy New Year. -N.L.M.-

2013: The Year in Review

January

Shell drilling rig runs aground

The New Year was rung in with news that Shell's conical drill rig Kulluk ran aground on the coast of Sitkalidak Island. Prior to New Year's Day, the tug boat Aiviq, which towed the propulsion-less Kulluk, experienced engine failure about 50 miles south of Kodiak. The towlines between the Aivig and the Kulluk also broke lose. Subsequent efforts by several boats, including the Coast Guard cutter Alex Haley, failed to get the Kulluk back under tow, as weather didn't cooperate. The Coast Guard evacuated the Kulluk crew by helicopter. After the weather calmed, the Kulluk was refloated and towed to Kiliuda Bay, where it remained until it was towed to an unnamed harbor in Asia for repairs. The drill rig Kulluk as well as the drill unit Noble Discoverer and a support fleet of ships were en route from the Chukchi and Beaufort Seas, where Shell had launched a first-ever exploration for oil and gas in the outer continental shelf areas off Alaska. Congress called for an investigation of the incident because the grounding amplified concerns of the industry's readiness to drill in the Arctic environment. The Coast Guard launched a formal investigation into the cause and circumstances of the grounding.

U.S. Interior Secretary Ken Salazar ordered an internal assessment of Shell's exploration season. The EPA issued two notices of violation for Clean Air Act permits for both drill rigs, the Kulluk and the Noble Discoverer.

The Arctic, Okhotsk and Baltic subspecies of the ringed seals were classified as threatened and the Ladoga subspecies of ringed seals was classified as endangered. The Beringia and Okhotsk populations of bearded seal were listed as threatened.

Coast Guard finds oily mess at frozen-in tug Rustler

Coast Guard officials and a team of environmental technicians traveled to Nome in January to clean up petroleum products inside Mike Benchoff's tug boat Rustler, sitting frozen in at the barge ramp at the Nome boat harbor. The Coast Guard had received a report of a potential pollution threat. Instead of the selfreported 100 to 200 gallons of lube oil, they found 600 gallons of assorted petroleum products on board. It took the crew more than five days to clean up the boat. This was not the first time oil had spilled from one of Benchoff's vessels. In 2010, Benchoff's boat, the 99 cent Romance. froze in at the harbor and had numerous oil spills. In 2011, the Rustler spilled product during the November 2011 storm and froze in at the south wall of the small boat harbor. Benchoff maintained he was being singled out and unfairly treated by port officials. After the incident, the Nome Common Council voted to ban Benchoff from using port facilities and impounded the Rustler. The tug was removed after the Council voted in April to eject the boat from its frozen position at the harbor. Benchoff maintained that it was illegal for the city to remove the vessel when parked in navigable waters of the state. The Port tariff states that the port director can impound a vessel if provisions of the tariff are not obeyed or if the owner has failed to remove it after notice. The vessel was removed at a price of more than plant to operate the mill and camp," he wrote.

The company's website advertises the project as being in close proximity to intertidal waters (Imruk Basin), within a few miles of the road systems — both the Teller and Kougarok roads — and in a "promining" jurisdiction. The property is comprised of 129 claims totaling 16,800 acres on claims bought from the Tweet family and on state and federal lands.

The Graphite One Resources website erroneously states "Nome has a deep-sea port that is readily accessible"

Accessibility is an issue as the deposit is located in a remote spot halfway between the Nome-Teller Highway and the Kougarok Road. In order to connect the deposit and potential mine, a road will have to be built.

The product would then be trucked to a harbor and shipped to importers such as Russia, China, Japan and South Korea. According to Jack diMarchi with the DNR's Large Mine Team, the team helps Graphite One to formulate an environmental baseline program.

"They need to characterize the environment before they impact it," said diMarchi. He added that the company is a long way from having a mine plan and that –if the resource proves up – permitting would not take place for another three or four years after more exploration and environmental work has been done.

Asked about the background of the company Besserer wrote that Graphite One is a Canadian public company, formerly called Cedar Mountain Exploration Inc., founded in Vancouver, Canada in March 2006. "Until 2012 we had a gold project on the Seward Peninsula (Joint Venture/Option Agreement with Ron Sheardown). When we acquired the Graphite Creek Project in January 2012, we wanted to focus on this deposit and changed our name to Graphite One Resources Inc. and no longer have an interest in any other properties," Besserer wrote. The company's head office is in Calgary, Alberta, with a second office in Vancouver.

Besserer has been a geological consultant for a number of advanced projects in Australia, Africa and Canada. "Other members of our team were also involved with a number of advanced assets," he wrote. "The Niblack Project in Alaska was the most recent. We also owned a portion of an operating nickel mine (Lanfranchi) in Australia and gold mine in Australia (Perserverance).

More recently, Jim Currie joined our Board of Directors. He was the COO of Newgold Inc. which put the New Afton Gold Mine into production in Canada," Besserer wrote.

For 2014, Graphite One plans to conduct another year of exploration.

If the deposit continues to look favorable, Besserer went on, the company wants to try to develop it as quickly as possible.

Asked about public engagement efforts, Besserer responded, "As we start to understand the deposit and determine whether it is economic we will actively engage the residents of Teller and Nome through public consultations and informal meetings as necessary.

"We have planning meetings in Fairbanks in January where we will schedule our community consultations in advance and will advertise this to ensure the people and shareholders know about the upcoming meetings well in advance."

HISTORIC— The image shows the Russian tanker Renda and the USCG icebreaker Healy parked in Nome's frozen roadstead to deliver fuel to Nome. The late winter delivery was initiated because Delta Western failed to deliver the fuel during the regular shipping season.

delivery up the coast to Red Dog Mine. That, and not weather, prevented the delivery, Bonanza claimed in court documents.

When the likelihood faded that DW would deliver the fuel as agreed, Bonanza's fuel program manager, Scot Henderson, tendered his resignation to Sitnasuak Native Corporation's president, Chuck Fagerstrom in an e-mail, according to court records. Bonanza Fuel is one of Sitnasuak's subsidiaries.

Fagerstrom did not accept Henderson's resignation.

DW has asked for a detailed list of the extra expenses claimed by Bonanza, suggesting that $1.5 million was an inflated figure because Vitus Marine knew Bonanza would seek compensation from DW's deep pockets.

Bonanza filed papers in court documenting the price paid to Vitus Marine for the fuel.

Bonanza settled on a plan to use the Russian-flagged ice class tanker Renda after sorting through alternatives, including flying in fuel at the cost of many thousands of dollars, according to executives. Nome Joint Utility System claimed its tanks were too short of surplus to sell to Bonanza.

Crowley Petroleum Distribution, another retailer in Nome, offered to sell some of its surplus to Bonanza, according to Bob Cox, vice president of fuel sales.

After considering the very high cost of flying in fuel at a quote of $3 to $4 per gallon for air freight, Bonanza elected to barge the fuel through the ice as a business decision, stated Jason Evans, Sitnasuak executive in January.

According to Bob Cox, vice president of fuel sales at Crowley, his company offered to sell surplus fuel to Bonanza at an undisclosed price, and to make fuel available from Crowley's storage in Kotzebue or Fairbanks.

That fuel would have had to come to Nome by airplane also, and the price would have included the transportion cost to Fairbanks or Kotzebue, Evans said during an interview Jan. 15.

DW denied Bonanza's claim that a higher price for a larger oil cargo had caused DW to off-load Bonanza's fuel order in favor of the Red Dog Mine.

Red Dog Mine had ordered 6 million gallons of diesel fuel. That was a business decision that put Bonanza's smaller order at risk of being blocked by ice-hard seas, Bonanza said.

DW also denied the contract with Red Dog contained a clause stating that if DW made a November delivery, DW would be locked into a fat contract to supply Red Dog for the following two years.

DW responded that logistics and a seasoned contract marine pilot's decision turned back the barge headed for Nome.

location to build the new Richard Foster building. The Alaska Legislature allocated $16 million for the building, which is to house the City's Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum and the Kegoayah Kozga Library. Throughout the year, the preferred location alternatives changed several times. A proposal to place the building at the playground next to Old St. Joe's and on parts of Anvil City Square sparked an initiative to "Save the Park". Eventually the city decided to purchase a 13acre parcel fromAlaska Gold Co. at the North end of Steadman Street with the idea to use it as the location for the new R. Foster Building.

NSHC begins move into new Norton Sound Regional Hospital

With the completion of the new Norton Sound Regional Hospital located at Greg Kruschek Avenue, Norton Sound Health Corporation aimed to finalize the move into the new facilities by January 30. However, citing the need for more time to train staff on new equipment, officials postponed the move to be completed by March 5.

By January, dental care, eye care, audiology, CAMP, finance, human resources and administration departments had been moved to the new

Nome port and Port Clarence identified as potential deep draft

A study released by the Army Corps of Engineers and the Alaska Department of Transportation and Public Facilities put Nome and Port Clarence on a short list of potential deep-draft Arctic harbors to be built.

Diminishing summer sea ice, the increase in shipping traffic through the Bering Strait and resource development off Alaska's coast spurred the study. The agencies worked on a feasibility analysis that will be completed in 2014.

Maritime Symposium held in

Residents of the Bering Strait are increasingly concerned about the impact of increased marine traffic and resource development in the Arctic. In order to shed some light on ongoing developments, UAF's Marine Advisory Program agent Gay Sheffield organized the first Bering Strait Maritime Symposium, held in

Nome Public Schools Superintendent resigns

On Feb. 12, amidst murky circumstances, Superintendent Michael Brawner handed a resignation letter to the Nome Board of Education. The circumstances were not made public but resulted in an investigation by the Alaska Professional Teaching Practices Commission.

Reasons for Brawner's resignation

were not revealed until the Commission issued a severe reprimand in April, stating that Brawner violated the Alaska Administrative Code of Ethics and Teaching Standards. Specifically, the commission referred to the section that states, "an educator may not sexually harass a fellow

In his letter, Brawner said circumstances beyond his control required him to be with family. Brawner began working in Nome in July 2011. He left Nome in March 2013. Nome Beltz High School personnel and special programs director Steve Gast was appointed to fill the Superintendent's position in the interim.

After a search for a new superintendent, the Board of Education hired Gast as the permanent Superintendent, offering him a two-year con-

Kawerak celebrates 40 years

On the date of its formal incorporation on February 20, Kawerak Inc. kicked off a yearlong celebration to commemorate 40 years as the region's non-profit Native organization. Kawerak board chairman Robert Keith said that Kawerak has come a long way in its 40 years of challenges and successes to improve the social, economic, political and cultural conditions in the Bering Strait and Norton Sound.

Kawerak started out with two employees and a $ 13,000 budget to today's 301 full-time employees and a budget of $35 million.

Second Paul Johnson Memorial race shortened

A winter storm and bitter cold wind chill temperatures halted the second Paul Johnson Memorial sled dog race in Shaktoolik, after the participating eight mushers had made it to Shaktoolik. The race was to be a 450-mile run from Unalakleet to Kaltag, back to Unalakleet and up the coast along the Iditarod trail to Nome. Bad weather crossed those plans and race officials decided to turn the race around from Shaktoolik back to Unalakleet with the winner being the first musher to arrive in Unalakleet. Bethel's Pete Kaiser won

Nome's Mike Morgan places third in Iron Dog

Mark McKenna and Dusty Van-Meter won the 2013 Iron Dog snowmachine race, completing their trek from Big Lake to Nome and on to Fairbanks in 36 hours and 58 minutes of trail time. One hour and 18 minutes later, Nomeite Mike Morgan and his partner Chris Olds finished the grueling race in third place. Nome's Evan Booth and his partner Doug Dixon had to scratch in Galena on their way to Fairbanks, due to a mechanical.

mushers in the 2013 Iditarod Trail Sled Dog race, Mitch Seavey of Seward won the grueling race in a time of nine days, seven hours and 39 minutes. Mitch Seavey was the 2004 champion and is the father of the 2012 champion Dallas Seavey. Just like his son in 2012, he had to contend with Two Rivers musher Aliy Zirkle, who put on a fight to the last minute but saw herself outrun again by a Seavey in the race for first place. Aliy Zirkle arrived under the burled arch 24 minutes after Mitch Seavey. Jeff King finished in third place, followed by Dallas Seavey in fourth po-

Esparza wins Nome-Golovin snowmachine race

Shanta Esparza of Golovin won the 2013 Nome-Golovin Snowmachine race in two hours and eight minutes of trail time. In all, 44 snowmachine racers started in four divisions to hit the 200-mile racecourse to Golovin and back to Nome. While Nome's Buddy Okleasik traded the lead back and forth throughout the race with Esparza, a torn track decided his fate at Fort Davis and he had to scratch. Bob Saccheus of Elim won the 0-600 cc division. Gabe Schaeffer of Kotzebue won the fancooled class and Dora Hughes won the women's division.

BSSD superintendent Rob Picou resigned

After three years on the job, Bering Strait School District Superintendent Rob Picou resigned for personal reasons. Picou served out the remainder of his contract and school year. The BSSD board eventually picked Brett Agenbroad of Arizona to replace Picou after a nationwide search resulted in eight finalists who applied for the job.

Nome hosts science conference

The sixth annual Western Alaska Interdisciplinary Science Conference was held at Northwest Campus, featuring three days of presentations from scientists who have conducted research in Western Alaska. The scientists updated attendees on watershed issues, subsistence species mapping, food security assessments and studies on the influence of subsistence practices on cultural tradi-

Nome Kennel Club holds first competitive race in years

The excited barking of local sled dogs rang through Nome once again as the Nome Kennel Club ran the inaugural Equinox Sled Dog Race - a three-day event - from March 24-26. Six local teams showed up at the starting line and all six finished the event. The first day, the race took the teams on a 15-mile trail, the following two days the course was 30 miles. Nils Hahn won the event in an elapsed time of six hours, 21 minutes. Second place went to Diana Haecker, third to Rolland Trowbridge, fourth to Kirsten Bey, fifth to Stephanie Johnson and sixth to Janet

Nome gets yarn-bombed

In order to bring awareness to the Governor's "Choose Respect" initiative, Nome knitters "yarn-bombed" Anvil Square and dressed the Three Lucky Swedes plus the giant gold pan in hand-knitted and crocheted garments. Yarn bombing is a term used when decorating public landmarks with handcrafted artwork to bring attention to a cause. In this case, it was the "Choose Respect" month of March to combat domestic violence and sexual abuse.

Nome's Postmaster retires

Laura Barnhill, Nome's U.S. Postmaster, retired in March after three years on the job in Nome. Barnhill said she wasn't ready to retire, but family health issues forced her to closer to medical facilities with cardio care units. Sherrie Madden was appointed to be her successor at the Nome Post Office.

April Kawerak Regional Conference celebrates 40 years

The 2013 Kawerak Regional Conference was held on April 9 through 11 at the Nome Rec Center, featuring days of networking and renewing contacts. This year's motto was 'Owning our future while Celebrating our Past." The conference offered educational presentations such as the U.S. Coast Guards tribal outreach; the drafting of wills; research on management of marine subsistence resources and on mental wellness. Lt. Gov. Mead Treadwell, poet Joan Kane, Iditarod 2011 champion John Baker and ICC Alaska president Jimmy Stotts gave speeches. Dance groups from several communities performed during the evenings to the delight of the audience.

Fairbanks climber injured on Mt. Osborn

Fairbanks climber Andy Sterns, 46, was rescued from Mount Osborn after a rock fall that broke his legs. His climbing partner Ian McRae of Nome saved the man's life by getting him off the accident site on the north face of the ominous Mt. Osborn, keeping him hydrated, warm and safe until help arrived. Although they carried a SPOT emergency beacon device with them, the reception behind the remote mountain on the north side was bad and it took several tries and venturing away from their base camp to get authorities alerted to the needed help. The climbers were rescued by Nome Search and Rescue and Sterns was flown by helicopter from their base camp. Sterns recovered from his in-dreds of seals hairless or dead. The breakout of the disease is still under federal investigation as an "unusual mortality event". Symptoms of the disease included bald seals, skin sores and apathy. The UME investigation has still not yielded any results on the cause of the disease. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration ruled out an infectious cause as the primary reason for the sick seals. In 2012, the Bering Strait region reported 53 animals bearing UME symptoms, but they were considered "survivors" of the 2011 outbreak. There were no seals seen with symptoms in the North Slope region.

Booth wins Kotzebue snowma-chine race

After a rough year competing, Evan Booth won the prestigious Archie Ferguson/Willie Goodwin Sr. Memorial Snowmachine race in Kotzebue. Booth finished the racecourse from Kotzebue to Noorvik, Kiana, Selawik and back to Kotzebue in two hours, 41 minutes and 31 seconds. Nome's Jarvis Miller raced to second place in two hours, 48 minutes and 45 seconds. Nomeites Buddy Okleasik and Jordan Miller were forced to scratch after Okleasik's track broke and Miller crashed.

Jarvis Miller wins Nome Cannonball race

Ten snowmachine drivers gathered for one last race on the fast melting trails around Nome. The adult racers braved the rough trail and ran five laps for a total of 150 miles. Jarvis Miller won the adult division. Juniors had to race only two laps. Christopher Reader took first place in the junior division. Donny Johnson won the 0-600 cc division.

May St. Lawrence Island whalers land six whales

Savoonga whaling captains Charles Edwards, Floyd Kingeekuk Jr., Larry Kingeekuk and Carl Pelowook Jr. and their crews landed a whale during spring whaling season. In Gambell, whaling captains Lloyd Apatiki and Tyre Ungott landed two whales. Little Diomede and Wales whalers were not able to land whales in the spring.

Winter shows no sign of leaving

While the winter of 2012/2013 was an average winter without extreme records set or broken, the spring of 2013 seemed to not arrive at all. The month of May broke four records for cold temperatures and snowfall.

ADF&G reports record king crab harvest

The commercial winter Red King crab harvest ended on May 15 with both record harvest of 22,630 crabs (62,158 pounds) and record prices of $6.73 per pound paid by buyers. In all, 26 commercial crabbers delivered their harvests to three buyers, namely Norton Sound Seafood Products, Robin Thomas and Frank McFarland.

Nome-Beltz High School graduates Devynn and Dylan Johnson signed letters of intent with Walla Walla Community College in Oregon. Dominic Hall signed on with Northwest Indian College in Bellingham, Washington.

BSSD shines at State NYO competition

Apaay Campbell of Gambell set a world record in knee jumping at 55 ½ inches to win the gold medal at the 2013 State Native Youth Olympics held in Anchorage. Stuart Towarak of Unalakleet defended his record of 114 inches in the One-Foot High kick. Towarak also earned the State Most Outstanding Male Performer award at the event.

June

Council votes to put museum on

Anvil City Square

Nome Common Council voted to build the R. Foster building which is to house the City's museum and library on Anvil City Square. The decision prompted a public outcry and a petition with 141 signatures was presented to the council in hopes to reverse their opinion, which it did. The council reconsidered and decided to put the Foster building at the originally planned site, north of Steadman, on land purchased from Alaska Gold.

Nome gets new Judge

The robing ceremony for Nome Superior Court Judge Tim Dooley took place in early June, with Supreme Court Justice Daniel Winfree and Superior Court Judge Michael Jeffrey of Barrow leading the ceremonial installation and official swearing-in. Dooley was appointed in April by Governor Sean Parnell, after Superior Court Judge Ben Esch retired from the Nome court system after 16 years of service.

Covenant Church gets new place of worship

The look of the corner of Bering Street and Front Street changed dramatically over the summer as the old Covenant church was torn down, the former Madden house was moved and what used to be the Knodel's Trading Post shop was turned into a Covenant Youth Center. Over the course of the summer, construction crews with the Samaritan Purse built a new church from the ground up and finished their work by the winter.

Army Corps of Engineers conducts deep-draft port study

With marine traffic increasing through the Bering Strait due to diminishing summer sea ice, the Army Corps of Engineers and the State's Dept. of Transportation teamed up to investigate the effects of a deep draft arctic port at Nome and Port Clarence. The agencies held meetings in Nome, Teller and Brevig Mission in order to scope public opinion on the prospect of ports in the region. Nome's leadership supports the development of a deep-draft arctic port in Nome for reasons of economic development and as a base for emergency responses in the Bering Strait and Chukchi Sea.

In Teller, residents told the Corps that they observe an increase in ship traffic in the last few years. Concerned with the reality that their subsistence way of life may change due the increase in traffic and human presence, Teller residents asked for a creation of a marine buffer zone to protect subsistence resources near shore.

The Corps analyzed the comments and is in the process to write a draft Environmental Impact Statement. The final release of the EIS is scheduled for Nov. 2014.

Bering Sea Alliance brings oil companies to Wales

A newly formed group called Bering Sea Alliance LLC brought together representatives from Shell, Conoco Phillips and Statoil to Wales in order start a dialogue of what happens when – and if – oil and gas resource development starts offshore of Alaska's coast. The Bering Sea Alliance LLC consists of several Bering Strait and Norton Sound village corporations who wish to have a seat at the table and a voice when policies affecting the region are being made. Also, the BSA LLC wants to make sure that economic and job opportunities are available to local residents as development occurs. All three oil companies didn't plan any exploration activity offshore this year.

NJUS installs wind turbines

Nome Joint Utilities System installed two giant wind turbines on top of Banner Ridge, where 16 smaller turbines already spin wind into electricity. NJUS began operating the wind farm called Banner Wind LLC in July Banner Wind LLC is co-owned by Bering Straits Native Corporation and Sitnasuak Native Corp. The two new 165-feet tall wind turbines were installed in July and in operation in August.

New Snake River Bridge built

The building of a new Snake River Bridge from Seppala Drive to Port Road was a major construction project going on this summer. The Dept. of Transportation and contractor Pro-West had begun driving in pilings for the piers in 2012 and continued to construct the bridge by Oct. 2013. The bridge replaces the old wooden abutment bridge that connects Port Road and Seppala Drive north of the Snake River.

2013 Gold Rush

Gold miners arrived in Nome for the summer offshore mining season with several new concepts of gold extraction machinery. Most notable was the increase in so-called surf crawlers, large mechanical dredges and two new jack-up rigs that dotted Norton Sound in front of Nome. The Dept. of Environmental Conservation and other agencies were alerted to a hydraulic oil spill that originated from one of the surf crawlers on July 6.

Nome Harbormaster Lucas Stotts

Nome has new Harbormaster

Long-time Harbormaster Joy Baker announced her retirement in July. Assistant Harbormaster Lucas Stotts was promoted to fill the position. Baker is still working for the City of Nome as the special projects manager for port development and expansion projects.

The Alaska Redistricting Board adopted a new conceptual election map for the 2014 elections. The new map shows District 39-T being closer to the boundaries before the 2012 election cycle. The map includes Shishmaref to the North, Huslia and Ruby to the east and Hooper Bay and Chevak in the south.

Redrawing Alaska's political map has been a long process since the 2010 census produced updated population numbers. After the Redistricting Board decided on 2012 map, the Alaska Supreme Court ordered the board to redraw the lines because four House districts didn't pass constitutional muster. An Alaska Superior Court ruling said that the board must hold public hearings when new plans are presented. Then, the U.S. Supreme court issued a decision that cut several steps out of the redistricting process. In July the board adopted the new map.

Nome teen crowned Miss Alaska Junior Teen

Nome's Allaryce Agloina, 15, was crowned Miss Alaska Junior Teen at the Alaska Miss America Coed pageant held in Anchorage. Her sister Aver won third place in the pageant's pre-teen division. Allaryce went on to represent Alaska in the nationwide Miss America Junior Teen pageant in Orlando, Florida.

VPO shot by bootlegger

Buckland Village Police Officer Lorin Geary, 48, was shot by Gary Ballot, 40, when the police officer intercepted Ballot in the attempt to import alcohol to the local option community of Buckland. Geary recovered from his injuries. Ballot pleaded guilty and is awaiting sentencing that is scheduled for February 3 2014 in Kotzebue.

August Nome records first commercial chum harvest in decades

The Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game reported the first commercial chum harvest in the Nome subdistrict. Two permit holders participated in the commercial fishery. The Nome subdistrict escapement range goal of 23,000 to 35,000 fish was met.

Red king crab fishery slow in summer

The Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game has moved the closed area boundary for the commercial king crab fishery three miles closer to Nome to help crabbers harvest the Norton Sound summer quota. The harvest started slow. Thirty of 35 permit holders delivered only 144,000 pounds of a total harvest level of 495,600 pounds by August.

St. Lawrence Island suffers dismal walrus harvest

The spring hunt for walrus, the staple of families living on St. Lawrence Island, didn't yield enough animals to fill the freezers for the winter. Senator Donnie Olson and Rep. Neal Foster petitioned the Governor to declare an economic disaster for the island. Adverse weather and ice conditions kept hunters from pursuing walrus during the peak time of their migration.

CHOSEN SITE FOR FOSTER BUILDING— The City of Nome purchased 13 acres, pictured here at the end of Steadman Ave. to build the R. Foster Building that will house the City's Carrie M. McLain Memorial Mueum and the city's library and potentially an add-on to house Kawerak's Beringia Cultural Center.

Hunters managed to harvest only 340 animals. In the past decade the harvest ranged between a low of 666 animals and a high of 1,394 animals. The governor declared an economic disaster but the declaration had little effect on the stark reality of empty freezers. The organization Alaska

Community on Toxins and Kawerak Inc. began collecting money and food donations to send to the communities of Gambell and Savoonga. NSEDC donated frozen fish; a large fish processor donated a connex full of canned salmon.

Council puts money down for Foster building

The Nome Common Council voted to move ahead with schematic design services for the Richard Foster Building. The council approved payment of nearly $300,000 to architects ECI/Hyer Inc. Kawerak Inc. and the City are pursuing another $2.8 million to build a separate space for Kawerak's Beringia Cultural Center.

Relay swimmers cross Bering Strait

An international team of 60 coldwater swimmers braved the freezing waters of the Bering Strait when they swam relay-style from Russia to Alaska. The swimmers were from Russia, the US, the UK, South Africa, Ireland, Italy, Poland, Czech Republic, Australia, Chile, Finland, Latvia and Estonia. They were accompanied on their 48-mile long swim relay by a Russian naval hospital ship.

The swim was dedicated to the 365th anniversary of Dezhnev's expedition, the 70th anniversary of the Alaska-Siberian Airway and the 25th anniversary of the Friendship Flight from Nome to Provideniya.

Civilians rescue stranded boater

In a string of unfortunate events, a boater who was stranded at Safety Sound had to wait days to be rescued from his predicament. While a civilian passenger in a local airplane notified the troopers of having seen a man in a boat waving a white trash bag for help, Carl Toshavik was not rescued until a day later, when another local pilot noticed the elderly man sitting slumped over in his boat. He landed his plane nearby, rounded up some help and got Toshavik safely to Norton Sound Regional Hospital.

The troopers were looking into the incident and conducted an internal investigation why no search and rescue was initiated.

Unalakleet hosts Chinook summit

In order to come up with a game plan to find a course of action that would bring back Chinook salmon to Southern Norton Sound, Art Ivanoff organized a Chinook Summit in August in Unalakleet. Subsistence stake holders from Norton Sound, Bethel, Tanana Chiefs Conference region as well as high level Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game officials, the Governor's rural affairs advisor, state Legislators Donnie Olson and Rep. Neal Foster and staff to Senator Lisa Murkowski, North Pacific Fisheries Council members and NSEDC staff and board members convened for one day to discuss how to restore once abundant king salmon runs.

Wes Perkins back at TelAlaska

After two and a half years of recovering from a near-fatal grizzly bear attack, Nome's Wes Perkins has reached his ultimate goal of being back at his old job as the TelAlaska area supervisor. Perkins was attacked and severely injured by a grizzly bear during a 2011 spring hunt at Skookum Pass. After more than 25 surgeries and two years of healing and recovery, Perkins reclaimed his old office at TelAlaska and said he was the happiest man on earth.

White House advisor visits Nome

Dr. Brendan Kelly, the assistant director for Polar Science at the White House traveled to Nome in August to gather input for the implementation plan of President Barack Obama's National Strategy for the Arctic. Kelly helped formulate the strategy paper. Kelly said a common Bering Strait vision of where the region sees itself in the long term future would help to take an active role in the management of the Arctic.

Kelly said the term "integrated Arctic management" used in the National Strategy asks for local involvement that invites the Bering Strait region to come up with its own vision and plan to ask back: How do the government and resource developers fit into our plan?

Parent charged after hitting teacher at Anvil City Science Academy

Parent Wilma Osborne was charged with three counts of assault after assaulting ACSA teacher and principal Todd Hindman on August 27 and a count of assault for hitting a police officer. After family posted bail, Osborne returned to the school the next day, but wasn't able to enter the premises because the school initiated lock-down procedures.

Osborne's lawyer Myron Angstman argued for psychiatric evalua-

The court approved the evaluation and ordered Osborne to fly to Anchorage. However, Osborne violated conditions of her release when she ran away from the airport as she was ready get on the Anchorage flight in September.

Alaska Airlines reduces flight service to Nome

On August 25, the new flight schedule of Alaska Airlines went into effect that reduced flights to and from the Gold Rush City from three daily flights to two. The flight reduction also cut out the loop that used to connect Nome to Kotzebue in a direct flight.

September Gold dredge burns in harbor

The gold dredge Argo went up in flames in the Nome Small Boat Harbor on Monday, Sept. 9. The fire engulfed the small dredge. It was parked at the south wall of the harbor. The fishing vessel Erica Renee and its crew came quickly to the rescue and doused the flames. The Nome Volunteer Fire Department arrived to get the fire quickly under control. Nobody was injured in the ordeal, but the dredge was totaled.

NVFD Chief Matt Johnson said the fire started from an oil-fired space heater inside the boat's cabin.

Surfcrawler tips over

A surfcrawler operating in the surf zone on West Beach tipped over into a depression on the ocean floor and had a hard time crawling out again. DNR mining administrator Byron Redburn and DEC's Nick Dallman were conducting a water turbidity survey when they came upon the tipped over rig. According to Redburn, no oil spilled from the suridentified as nuisance wildlife by Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game officials. The first bear was shot and only wounded by a Nome Police officer in the Lester Bench neighborhood. The bear was not found, dead nor alive. A second bear was shot and killed near Sixth Avenue, also by a police officer. Several bear sightings were reported in Nome and surrounding settlements until late in the

City elections

Only 34.15 percent of Nome's registered voters showed up at the polling places for the municipal election. Mayor Denise Michels received 82 percent of the votes, winning the mayor seat once more. Tom Sparks and Pat Krier, running for Seat A, had to face each other in a runoff election that was won by incumbent Sparks. Jerald Brown defeated Louie Green Jr. for Seat E; Matt Culley, running unopposed for a seat vacated by Josie Stiles, received 53 percent of the votes, beating 302 write-ins for Jim Abbott. Pat Knodel won a seat at the utility board. Berda Willson won 91.6 percent to remain on the utility board. School board Seat E incumbent Barb Amarok won over challenger Brandy Arrington.

Nome woman dies of head

Jothilda Noongwook, 50, died of head injuries on Oct. 5 that she suffered on Sept. 18 at residence on Campbell Way. The Nome Police Department responded to a report of an unconscious female who was unresponsive. Noongwook was taken to Norton Sound Regional Hospital where head trauma was diagnosed. She was taken to the Alaska Native Medical Center where she died on Oct. 5. The State Medical Examiner's office assumed jurisdiction in conducting a review of the cause of death. The NPD investigation also continued. NPD has not responded to requests on the status of the investi-

Alaska Airlines under fire for changed schedule

The impact of Alaska Airlines' changed schedule took a few weeks to be fully understood by Nomeites, Nome's businesses and medical facilities. In a Nome Chamber of Commerce meeting, Alaska Airlines fcrawler and no citations were issued.

U.S. Senator Mark Begich visits town

Sen. Mark Begich came to Nome on Sept. 14 to conduct a one-hour town hall meeting and to hold a listening session on the reauthorization of the Magnuson-Stevens Act. Among grievances vented at the town-hall meeting were frustrations with Alaska Airlines dropping one flight from the daily three flights and cutting the Nome to Kotzebue loop. He also heard Teller's frustration of still not having water and sewer services and of living in third world conditions. Begich heard of the need for an alcohol and drug treatment center in Nome and frustrations concerning offshore gold mining outfits hampering subsistence fishing at Fort Davis.

Brown bears shot in town

Two grizzly bears were shot within city limits after having been representatives were present to hear grievances from citizens. Fresh flowers for the local flower shop don't get to Nome in time and if they do at increased costs; groceries are sometimes delayed in arriving and while shelves in Nome are empty, perishables stack up in Anchorage. Under the new schedule Nomeites can't do day trips to Anchorage for business or medical reasons anymore, travel to Anchorage now involves hotel stays at extra costs. The representatives listened and promised to stay in touch with Nome's Chamber of Commerce to see what can be done to alleviate some of the negative impacts of the schedule change.

Court grants protective order in Olanna vs. Smith

Nome's Judge Tim Dooley granted a six-month stalking protective order sought by Kyan Olanna against Tim Smith. Olanna is an attorney for NSEDC residing in Anchorage. She alleged that Nome

Smith had been critical of NSEDC and was banned from the organization's board meetings after refusing to turn off a tape recorder during a committee session at a NSEDC board meeting in which he wanted to testify at the time allotted for public comment.

Further limiting public participation, NSEDC's board voted in December to limit their meetings to residents of the NSEDC member communities, effectively disallowing long-time Nome Nugget reporter Laurie McNicholas, who covered the NSEDC beat for years, to continue attending NSEDC meetings. McNicholas recently moved to Anchorage.

Shishmaref votes to stay dry

During municipal election, Shishmaref voters decided to keep the village dry. A proposal to lift the ban of alcohol was on the ballot during the election. Mayor Stan Tocktoo reported that 124 voters cast their vote to stay dry, whereas 98 voters wanted to Shishmaref to allow alcohol.

Nomeites vote yes on Fluoride

As Nome voters headed to the polls again on Nov. 5 to decide in a run-off election whether Tom Sparks or Pat Krier should win a seat at the Common Council, they also had the chance to say if they are for or against water fluoridation.

Sparks won and the voters decided to return fluoride into the City's water supply. In all, 220 voters were for, 160 against the fluoridation.

Nome man survives fall into icy Nome harbor

Nome's Howard Farley, 81, survived a fall into the icy waters of the Nome small boat harbor when he slipped while trying to go from one fishing vessel to another. According to eyewitnesses, Farley spent nearly 30 minutes in the water while helpers tried to get him out. During the fall, Farley dislocated a shoulder, so his rescuers were trying not to hurt him while fishing him out of the water.

Bering Sea storms pound Western Alaska

A succession of storms battered western Alaska with high winds, rising waters, snow, hail, sleet and freezing rain. The most significant damage was reported from Kotlik. St. Michael and Stebbins. Rising waters damaged homes, roads and other infrastructure. Relief efforts went underway to collect money, clothes and household items for the seven families that were displaced from their homes in Stebbins. Governor Sean Parnell issued state disaster declarations for several Norton Sound and Bering Strait communities. Kotlik was hit the worst and emergency relief workers found that 111 Kotlik residents, are in need of individual disaster assistance and 31 households have been severely affected by the

GCI connects Nome to broadband internet

GCI completed its TERRA Northwest system and connected Nome to a system of fiber optic cable and a series of microwave towers that allows for faster internet speed than previously available via satellite connection. GCI plans to expand the network to Kotzebue in 2014.

AIDEA pursues Road to Ambler Mining District

Canadian exploration company NovaCopper has its eyes fixed on the copper deposit at the Ambler mining district, but needs to gain access through 220 miles of pristine wilderness. The Alaska Industrial Development and Export Authority AIDEA is now looking at the potential to build an industrial access road to Ambler and seeks to find an investor who would build, maintain and operate that industrial road. The proposal of the road and the potential mine is of concern for communities along the

December Unusual weather rings in warm December

The first week of December saw

Nomeites dress in raingear rather than snowpants as a Pineapple Express system first dumped 3.7 inches of wet snow on Nome. Within a few days, temperatures rose to above the freezing mark and snow turned to rain. The resulting ice on roads and surfaces stopped business as usual. Nome Public Schools canceled school and most public meetings or events were canceled or postponed.

Avian cholera to blame for dead migratory birds

An outbreak of avian cholera was responsible for the death of hundreds of birds that had washed up dead at St. Lawrence Island beaches. Three birds were sent in to the USGS's National Wildlife Health Center and the lab confirmed that the birds died from the bacterial infection caused by what is known as avian cholera. This is the first time that an outbreak of avian cholera was detected in

Nome loses police officers to higher pay elsewhere

The Nome Police Department currently has only four police officers on patrol, with a fifth out due to worker's comp and two community service officers helping to pick up the slack. NPD Chief John Papasodora said low pay, high costs of living, high rents and better benefits elsewhere keep NPD officers from remaining in town. Sgt. Ian Koenig moved to Soldotna in early December and another police officer is also set to leave soon.

Nome Common Council members promised to look at the issue.

Nome tackles safe route to schools

Nome Eskimo Community received a grant from the Dept. of Transportation to develop a Safe Routes to School plan to make the trip to Nome's Elementary School safer for kids than it currently is. During a public meeting planner Nicole McCullough said that several options are available to make the roads and the parking lot around NES safer. Once a plan is put in place, NEC will pursue more funding to implement recommendations from the plan.

BARELY FROZEN— Unusually warm weather for December kept Nomeites dressed in rain gear and even the ocean took its time to slowly freeze up.

Governor Parnell announced board and committee appointees

Curtis Thayer named acting Commissioner of Administration

Governor Sean Parnell named Curtis Thayer acting commissioner for the Department of Administration. Thayer served as deputy commissioner for Administration and fills the vacancy created by the resignation of Becky Hultberg.

As deputy commissioner, Thaver was responsible for the Divisions of Administrative Services, General Services, Personnel and Labor Relations, DMV, Enterprise Technology Service, Alaska Oil & Gas Conservation Commission and Alaska Public Broadcasting Commission.

Thayer also served as deputy commissioner of the Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development, where he was responsible for the Divisions of Banking & Securities, Insurance, Corporations, Business and Professional Licenses, Community and Regional Affairs, and Economic Development. He previously served on the boards of Alaska Housing Finance Corporation, Alaska Gasline Development Corporation, and on the Alaska Royalty Oil and Gas Development Advisory Board.

Prior to his service with the State of Alaska, Thayer worked for EN-STAR Natural Gas Company, and the Alaska Gas Producers Pipeline Team. He also spent several years in Washington, D.C., working for Congressman Don Young and the Committee on Resources in the U.S. House of Representatives and later worked with Senators Ted Stevens and Lisa Murkowski.

Governor Parnell Announces Board Appointments

Governor Sean Parnell announced appointments to the board of directors of the Alaska Railroad Corporation, Real Estate Commission, Alaska Public Broadcasting Commission, Emerging Energy Technology Fund Advisory Committee, Denali Access System Advisory Committee, State Officers Compensation Commission, and Alaska Chilkat Bald Eagle Preserve Advisory Council.

Board of Directors of the Alaska Railroad Corporation

Governor Parnell reappointed John Binkley to the board of directors of the Alaska Railroad Corporation. The board of directors manages the Alaska Railroad Corporation and its assets.

Binkley, of Fairbanks, has more than 30 years of experience in the tourism and transportation industry. He is the president of the Alaska Cruise Association, and former chief executive officer of Riverboat Discovery and Gold Dredge 8. Binkley also served in the Legislature as a senator and representative. He is reappointed to a seat for the fourth judicial district.

Real Estate Commission Governor Parnell appointed Cynthia Cartledge to the Real Estate

Commission. The commission regulates and controls licensing, suspensions, and revocations of the real estate industry, and manages the recovery fund.

Cartledge, of Anchorage, is a shareholder at Wohlforth, Brecht, Cartledge, & Brookings, APC. She is a member of the National Association of Bond Lawyers, Alaska Gov-Finance Officers ernment Association, and the real estate committee of the Alaska Bar Association. Cartledge serves as vice president of the Alaska Women's Aid in Crisis Foundation Board, and is a member of the State of Alaska Bar Association Law Examiners Committee. She is a past board member of Victims for Justice. Cartledge holds her bachelor's degree from Northern Arizona University and her juris doctorate from Seattle University School of Law. She is appointed to a public seat.

Alaska Public Broadcasting Commission

Governor Parnell appointed AnnaBell Stevens to the Alaska Public Broadcasting Commission. The commission encourages and supervises development of an integrated state public broadcasting system, and recommends grant funding.

Stevens, of Anchorage, has been the AFL-CIO community services liaison for the United Way of Anchorage since 1999. She is active in her community as a member of the Alaska Center for the Blind and Visually Impaired, Senior Citizens Advisory Commission, and the Business and Professional Women of Alaska. Stevens is appointed to a public seat.

Emerging Energy Technology Fund Advisory Committee

Governor Parnell reappointed Eric Eriksen and Brent Petrie to the Emerging Energy Technology Fund Advisory Committee. The committee, created by the Legislature, makes grants from the fund for demonstration projects of technologies that have a reasonable expectation to be commercially viable within five years, and that are designed to test emerging technologies or methods of conserving energy, or improving existing technologies.

Eriksen, of Juneau, works as the vice president of transmission and distribution at Juneau's Alaska Electric Light & Power (AEL&P), a position he's held since 2006. Eriksen has served in several roles with AEL&P, including assistant transmission and distribution engineer, and assistant generation engineer. He has also served as team leader for the University of Alaska space grant and held a science and engineering fellowship for the U.S. Department of Energy. Eriksen received a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering from the University of Alaska Fairbanks and a master's degree in business administration from the University of Alaska Southeast. He is reappointed to an electric utility seat.

Petrie, of Anchorage, is the manager of Petrie and Associates, a consulting firm engaged in energy projects and project management. He previously was the manager of special projects and key accounts for Alaska Village Electric Cooperative Inc., general manager of the INN Electric Cooperative Inc., and held management positions with the Alaska Energy Authority and the Department of Natural Resources.

Saying it Sincerely

By Rev. Ross Tozzi, St. Joseph Catholic Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Association

Oh Lord, I cry for help

Listen, God, to my prayer, do not hide from my pleading; hear me and give answer. I rock with grief; I groan. (Psalm 55: 2-3)

Oh Lord I cry for help for the victims of domestic violence. Heal those wounded by angry words, harmed by feelings turned inside out, made to feel ugly, unintelligent, unworthy of any love, intimidated, economically abused,

Oh Lord I cry for help for those in the grip of fear. Put an end to the beatings . . . the unrelenting violence . . .the unceasing pain. Grant courage to those who feel all alone, those who stay, those who cry out silently each

Oh Lord I cry for help for those who inflict violence. Lead them to a greater awareness of the wickedness of domestic violence, help them to realize the damage done and the hope destroyed, and give them the grace to repent of their sins and seek the healing that only you can provide.

Oh Lord I cry for help for our culture of violence. Put an end to all that glorifies physical, sexual, psychological, and verbal abuse in entertainment, in music, films, and videos. Lead us to a moral revolution to replace our culture of violence with a culture of respect for the dignity of each and every person.

Oh Lord I cry for help, listen to all our prayers and grant us the courage to act always in peace and ever in justice.

Governor Parnell appointed General Carrol H. "Howie" Chandler to the Alaska Military Force Advocacy and Structure Team (AMFAST). AMFAST provides recommendations to the governor on how best to retain and build on the state's current military force capability, and advocates for the proposed strategies as outlined in the AMFAST short-term and long-term strategic plans. General Chandler served in the U.S Air Force for 37 years, retiring as a four-star general and as the 35th vice chief of staff of the Air Force. In this role, he organized, trained, and equipped 680,000 active-duty, Guard, Reserve, and civilian forces serving in the United States and overseas. Chandler has a vested interest in Alaska, having served as commander of Alaskan Command and commander of the Pacific Air Forces. He holds a bachelor's degree from the U.S. Air Force Academy and a master's degree in management from Webster University. Chandler is appointed to a public to even make ends meet!

Rather than attempting to walk in the tattered shoes of the less connected, however, a few politicians now tend to act more like elected aristocracy, than they do someone who is hurting socially and economically!

In other words, to play the part, you must first understand the part and live it, which most career politicians have not! So I figured that I had damned well better say what is on my mind here and now, while it is still semi-legal to do so, and while the "The Magnificent Bill of Rights" still exists in its present and unaltered form?

H. Rick Tayares Campo, California,

Dear Editor:

Have you noticed in the ADN 12/24/13 page A-8, Izembek: Road supporters say they don't plan to give up fight. 3rd column over second paragraph down the governor says, "unconscionable" and another "irrational decision by the federal government that denies Alaskans access - in this case access to emergency treatment.'

What about the 40,000+ Alaskans that are the working poor that could use the Obama care for their medical emergencies that the governor is denying them? Who is calling the kettle black here? John Suter

Dear Nancy,

Greeting to you all at the Nome Nugget!

Here's wishing all you readers a very Merry Christmas 2013 and a prosperous New Year 2014 and beyond. I just want to take this time to thank you all, from the elders on down for your prayerful support during the sudden loss of my dear nephew David Vernon Slwooko whom passed away on September 24, 2012 while en-route from Koyuk to Unalakleet.

In some ways this has been the worst year of my life spiritually, mentally and physically. We all deal with death and we all handle it differently as individual, as families, and corporately as believers.

I talk to ministers often and one question I had to ask: Do we stand before the judgment seat of Christ when we breathe our last? The answer a resounding yes! I am now more convinced of our own eternal destiny. Will we hear God say to us someday "come enter into the joy of the Lord" or depart from me I never knew you.

The latter is very real and hell is very real. Many of us say to others sometimes "you go to hell,

My grandparents have been gone for years, Harold and Anna Ahmasuk Sr. and Charles and Amy Slwooko and the man whom I am named after Howard I. Slwooko Sr. whom passed on nearing 20 years.

The one thing that sustained myself was a beautiful dream I myself had of Grandpa Ahmasuk welcoming David to a very bright door and I won't elaborate more. You see I'm told from a very reliable source that my late grandfather Ahmasuk was a great hunter as well as many men of Wales, Alaska where my mother Ellen is from. Lord willing she will turn 84-years young January 11, 2014 so mark that on your calendars and don't forget to call and wish this dear saint of ours a Happy Birthday.

My dear nephew David, I know was turning into a great-hunter too, how I cherish the good memories of our outings though imperfect we humans are. I have had a hard time letting him go and I believe as it has been said that we lose our loved ones in pieces.

Some day soon we will be made whole. Thanks to God for our godly widows who prays much for family. my mother, I think of our dear friend Maggie Olson of Golovin and oth-

Thanks most of all goes to God whom is very familiar with death. Micah 6:8 says: He has showed you, O man, what is good. And what does the Lord require of you? To act justly and to love mercy and to walk humbly with your God.

Thanks to our family members ear and far who call often and ei courage my mother a lot. Greetings to the Ahmasuk and Slwooko tribes. For a great 2013 Christmas celebration may we all celebrate sobriety, sanely and be doers and not hearers only. Good luck to all you hunters of the land, sea and air and don't' forget to be generous with your

Hello out there,

I hope this finds you all doing good. Even though the years seem to be going fast, circumstances have made it seem like a long year.

I really don't know why they have changed the law to where parents can't discipline their kids with a good spanking without getting in trouble— it makes the kids think they could get away with more and frustrates the parents.

Not only that, but our town seems to be going backwards. Like their letting people get away with more and more things. Just seems to me like people could beat on other people, or whatever, and not seem to do much time.

In all my kids growing up lives, I have tried to look for help for different situations—I have asked different agencies/people, and where does it get me-nowhere. Even as far as asking the school to hold my kids back because I think it would benefit them—to no avail there too. It saddens me—breaks my heart to see kids passed into the next grade, and have bad grades. In my day, we would have been held back.

It seems, no matter how hard I try to get community functions together, people think they are too busy for it. And yet, you'd find out you're hav-

The shame of Eskimo Dancing around our region here is that our ancestors were told it was evil. You can look at all kinds of countries and see that dancing is everywhere—if God didn't mean for things like that, then people wouldn't know about it. And it's fun to boot. All I need to get Eskimo Dancing started are some drums.

I could have sworn that there was a time when, if you wanted someone out of the house, regardless of who it is, they had to leave. I think maybe my friend would still be alive today if that was the case.

Just like, OMG, the companies that are taking advantage of us people living in the villages, they should come and stay for a while and see how they like it. Then they tack on these outrageous rates when you are late on paying, and say they're due

The thing that really gets me though, is the people who are voted into office, saying they have the people's interest in mind, and then they line their pockets with the money that is supposed to go to helping the people who voted them in. If only some of us could make in a year what some of them get as bonuses, we'd be able to afford more for our kids. How about reinvesting into our communities instead? Or, at least give us some dividends too, so we could pay for these outrageous prices they charge us to live around

I'm sure glad NSEDC has a fishing program where some people could make some money fishing for baitfish. They are paying 50¢ a pound, and the shipping is free. Only costs $75 a year, of which they are willing to take out of you check, to get you started. Pretty good deal I'd say. Quyanna-buk NSEDC.

I hope all of you have some great holidays! Don't forget to look at the beauty of the sky. I thank God every day for such glorious things. Take care you all.

As always, Karen Nanouk Unalakleet, AK 99684

nod their heads. She said it's not just some of us, it's not just the two thirds you read about, it's not the fact that it is ten times the reported average than the rest of the United States for aggravated sexual assaults against women, its everyone that you have met. I know these people I grew up with them, they have all been raped.'

The ILOC report focuses on reducing domestic violence in Alaska, noting "The situation in Alaska is urgent...and of national importance...The Commission's findings and conclusions represent the unanimous view of nine independent citizens, Republicans and Democrats alike: It is the Commission's considered finding that Alaska's approach to criminal justice issues is fundamentally on the wrong track." Moreover, the Commission found that responsibility for rampant crime in rural Alaska "lies primarily with the State's justice system.

In his presentation yesterday, Troy Eid elaborated, saying "And we think that very strongly that the role that nations, in this case Alaska Native Nations have ought to be respected, not just by the federal government but by the state government.'

The ILOC report made several recommendations to reduce crime in rural Alaska, including collaborating with tribes on other criminal justice issues, deputizing tribes to provide a wide array of criminal justice services, and adopting a policy of state deference to tribal authority in tribal communities. These recommendations are the polar opposite of Parnell Administration efforts to undermine tribal sovereignty through the Kaltag, Minto, and other court cases. As Attorney General Geraghty's letter in response to the ILOC report makes clear, the Parnell Administration will continue to oppose tribal sovereignty even though such opposition has been found to exacerbate rural violence.

MUSIC DIRECTOR— Nome Elementary School music teacher Ron Horner worked hard with all grades to study and perform Christmas songs at the annual Nome Elementary School Christmas Program, held on Dec. 17 at the Nome Elementary School gym. The program attracted a full house and started out with the school band consisting of sixth graders. Fourth graders performed on their first instrument, the recorders. Younger grades learned popular Christmas carols and let it jingle all the way.

Flu season claims two deaths in Alaska

By Diana Haecker

Last week, two adults died from the flu, confirms the Alaska Dept. Health and Social Services.

The two individuals were from the Anchorage/Mat-Su area and from the Interior.

The fatalities mark the first adult deaths reported by the department.

A regulation change mandates that health care facilities begin reporting adult flu deaths; before the change they were only required to report flu deaths of children.

State Epidemiologist Dr. Brian Yablon confirmed that the flu is widespread throughout the state.

"We're in the thick of flu season," said Dr. Yablon. "It is still important to get vaccinated."

According to the latest numbers collected in the weekly flu snapshot, published online, there were 76 laboratory confirmed cases of the swine flu and three confirmed cases of a different flu strain for the week between Dec. 22-28.

In total since the beginning of the flu season in Sept., there were 290 laboratory confirmed cases. While

Magistrate dismisses charges against Wilma Osborne

By Sandra L. Medearis

Magistrate Judge Brooke Alowa said she would dismiss charges against Wilma Osborne this week, that she had been in jail longer than she would have if she was not suffering brain disease and facing charges.

This denied her right to due process, Alowa found.

Alowa urged the state to find a placement for Osborne's mental health treatment.

Osborne has been in custodial limbo at AMCC for more days than she would serve had she been convicted of the misdemeanors with which she is charged, Magistrate Alowa found at a status hearing Jan.

The school went into cautionary lockdown.

Charging documents state she committed criminal trespass in returning to school grounds again the next day after her family bailed her out, against release conditions.

Charging documents say resistance to the original arrest caused responding Officer Chris Inderrieden to pepper spray Osborne.

State revenue continues to shrink as less oil trickles through the Trans-Alaska Pipeline.

With 94 percent of the state budget coming from oil and gas revenues, spending will need to be adjusted, Foster said.

The three big cost drivers in the state are Medicare, education and retirement costs that make up about 50 percent of the state budget. These costs are projected to eat up bigger portions of the budget pie in the future.

Last year, the revenue forecast estimated the state's income to decline by $500 million. In reality, revenue declined by $2 billion. What are the options to keep the state afloat?

Foster said to reign in operating spending and to dip into the state's savings accounts seem to be inevitable courses of action.

If there is an annual increase by 1 percent, and oil throughput decreases at its current rate, the state's reserves would be drained by 2028.

Foster said legislators have to be creative and have to make the case that funding of certain projects in our region has a statewide benefit.

For example, in light of Arctic growth, statewide benefits could be argued for Port of Nome expansion funds, as the City seeks to add a middle dock to alleviate congestion at the barge ramps and the other two docks. City Councilmember Stan Andersen was present to lobby the Legislators for $3 million to go towards that project.

Nome Kennel Club to begin race season

Bv Deb Trowbridge

It is the time of year that Nome dog mushers typically begin racing their teams. Nome Kennel Club's race committee and mushers of Nome are prepared to hold sled dog races as soon as there is enough snow on the ground.

When that happens we welcome the public to join us in the fun as a musher, a spectator or as a volunteer. Volunteers can do anything from helping to stake and establish a trail before the race; timing and recording during the race, and simply being available for whatever is needed at the race. Thanks to the City of Nome, the staging area, start and finish of most races will be located at the north end of the City's snow storage facility off Greg Kruschek Avenue.

The race schedule is: January 18 — NKC 8 Dog

Race/12-20 miles

February 1-2 — NKC 12 Dog Race/day 1: 30 miles/day 2: 30 miles

February 22— NKC 12 Dog Race/30 miles

March 14 — NKC Businessmen's Race/3 miles

March 21-23 - NKC Equinox Race/60-110 miles total

March 28-30 - NKC Nome-Council 200/200 miles

This schedule is subject to change due to trail and weather conditions.

The Businessmen's Race is scheduled during the week Iditarod finishers arrive in Nome. It is the NKC's main fundraiser and allows visitors and residents to race on a short race trail with three sled dogs for the experience of mushing.

The Equinox Sled Dog Race was brand new to the NKC last year. It was a success as weather and trail conditions were near perfect. Six local mushers competed for a $4,500 purse, thanks to the generous support of BSNC, Sitnasuak, Pro-West Contractors, Norton Sound Health Corporation and NSEDC. It's a goal to continue the Equinox Sled Dog race as an annual event.

This year, NKC plans to bring back the Nome-Council 200 race, a 200-mile event that was run for years until 2004.

Visiting race teams are encouraged and welcomed to race with us. So if you know of a musher who may be interested, share this information with them.

To learn more about the Nome Kennel Club activities at our Facebook page. Message us on Facebook or email us at nkc@nomekennelclub.com for questions.

Let it snow and we hope to see you at the races!

In the Meantime

The old song, "The Rich Get Rich and the Poor Get Poorer..." ain't much fun. America's middle class is shrinking and it isn't because we are all getting richer. The numbers at the bottom of the pile are increasing, as many Nomeites are well aware. The rich are now obscenely wealthy. Some make so much they could not possibly spend it in a lifetime. (Wouldn't we all like to try?)

Let's not focus our economic vision on the global scale. We need to concentrate on our local and state economy. Look at how much we pay the top members of our corporations. Look at our non-profits. Look at the wide gap between the top officials (and board members) and the professionals and staff who do the real work. We need to reexamine how we divvy up the funds. The "we" in most situations are the shareholders who elect or appoint board members. The board needs to be a functional board with the good sense to trim their own deadwood and reduce the perks and the size of their board. Boards can only be more efficient if shareholders step up to their responsibility and take matters in hand. Of course corporations are not the only examples of the financial gap. Local government can cut the pay at the top and eliminate "consulting fees" to allow some bucks to trickle down to the working stiff.

The middle class has made our nation strong. They are the lifeblood of our economy and the future of America. However, there is hope. The widening economic gap can be bridged at the grass roots level, if we try. - N.L.M.-

Arctic deep draft port study to be released in March

By Diana Haecker

Will it be Nome or Port Clarence? Or both? The region will have to wait until March when a draft report will be released to answer which port site or a combination thereof are chosen as deep draft ports to accommodate the increase in marine traffic in the Arctic.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the Alaska Dept. of Transportation and Public Facilities have cooperated in a three-year study on the feasibility of establishing a deepwater seaport in the Arctic.

Nome and two locations at Port Clarence, Point Spencer and Cape Riley, rose to the top of the short list selected by the study team.

The two agencies held public meetings this summer in Nome, Brevig Mission and Teller to scope public opinion.

A draft report of the study, its recommendations and an Environmental Impact Statement are due to be released sometime in March, said US Army Corps of Engineers project manager Lorraine Cordova.

The draft feasibility study will reveal which combination of potential port sites would make the most economic sense.

The study team has made a tentatively selected plan, which is currently under review at the Army Corps of Engineers headquarters. Cordova explained that the Corps is tasked to figure out the highest net benefit to the nation, but since the State is paying half of the bill for the feasibility study, the benefit to the State of Alaska will have to be figured in.

After the draft feasibility study is released in March, there will be a 30day public comment period. Cordova said she hopes to have meetings in Nome, Teller and Brevig Mission prior to the release of the draft report.

Public comments will be worked into the final report. Barring radical changes in the proposed plan, there won't be a second public comment period for the final plan.

The goal is for the Assistant Secretary of the Army to sign off on the final report in December 2014. After that, it goes to Congress for the appropriation of funds.

the flu is widespread, it is not considered of epidemic proportions.

"We are not experiencing a pandemic," he said. According to experts, Alaska is going through the normal seasonal influenza.

A few years ago, the swine flu hit the state during the spring and summer, with a virus strain that hadn't been seen before

Dr. Yablon said the vast majority of laboratory confirmed cases during this season tested positive for the H1N1 strain, also known as the swine flu strain. "It's the same strain that caused a flu pandemic a few years ago," Dr. Yablon said.

Last year the prevailing strain found in most flu cases was the H3N2 strain. Dr. Yablon said it is very hard to tell the difference in symptoms between those two strains.

All influenza A viruses can cause similar symptoms such as high fever, sore throat, cough and body aches, Dr. Yablon said.

"There is some evidence that H1N1 may cause more gastro intestinal symptoms," he said. The best way to prevent the flu is to get vacci-

Era Alaska changes name to Ravn Alaska

By Diana Haecker

As soon as the Alaska Dept. of Transportation signs off on the name change, the group of airlines known as Era Alaska will be called Ravn Alaska. The name change was announced in a press release last week. The DOT is expected to accept the name change this week, said Era director of sales and marketing Steve Smith.

The group of airlines consists of Era Aviation, Hageland Aviation Services and Frontier Flying Service. They will collectively be called Ravn Alaska.

On paper, Era Aviation will become Corvus Airlines - corvus is the Latin name for the genus of ravens and crows. Corvus Airlines will be the certified name for the FAA and the state's DOT.

Hageland Aviation and Frontier Flying Service's names will remain the same on the certificates but both airlines will be called Ravn Connect as a brand name.

Asked about the intentional "misspelling" of raven, Smith explained that as a brand name, the company chose to spell Ravn without an "e because there are several other companies that bear the name Raven. "We wanted to be different," said Smith.

The primary reason to change the name from Era to Ravn was to avoid confusion, Smith explained. The name Era was consistently mixed up with Era Helicopters, which at one time belonged to Era Aviation, but then the companies split up and separated. "We felt it was necessary and timely to change the name," Smith

"The raven embodies several characteristics that we as a company relate to: they are found all over our great state, they are strong, unrelenting, capable and tenacious," explained Smith.

He said the name change was not initiated after the tragic accident of a Hageland flight outside of St. Mary's last November. The process to rename the company began six months ago.

"The only change our customers will see in Nome will be some new signage," said Smith.

The company will continue to operate in its current structure. There has been no change in ownership, staff or locations served.

After the FAA and the DOT fully sign off on the rebranding of Era Alaska to Ravn Alaska, the company's name transition will happen in phases. The website will transition from flyera.com to flyravn.com.

Ravn Alaska is the largest regional air group based in Alaska, operating daily passenger and cargo services to nearly 100 communities statewide.

Norton Sound 450 dog race cancelled

The Norton Sound Sled Dog Club in Unalakleet announced on Monday the cancellation of the 2014 Paul Johnson Memorial/Norton Sound 450 Sled Dog Race. Race director Middy Johnson said that funding, local training conditions and schedule timing played into the decision. The sled dog club said in a press release that they are committed to continue the mid-distance event and to come forward with information on the 2015 race in the coming months.

Bethel's Pete Kaiser won the inaugural Paul Johnson Memorial/Norton Sound 450 sled dog in 2012. Last year, bad weather turned the mushers back at Shaktoolik. After mushers finished the first part of the race that took them from Unalakleet to Kaltag and back, they encountered bad weather from Unalakleet to Shaktoolik. The race was turned back to Unalakleet.

The fastest musher to finish the 40 miles from Shaktoolik to Unalakleet was Pete Kaiser, who was declared winner of the 2013 PJM/NS 450 race.

Although the PJM/NS 450 has been canceled for this year, the club's longstanding Portage Sled Dog race from Unalakleet to Kaltag and back is still a go. Middy Johnson said the exact date is not yet determined, but it will be held at the end of February.

BELMONT POINT CEMETERY - In order to expand the city's cemetery, surveys were done last year to mark property boundaries and also to identify unmarked burial sites.

Radar survey identified 96 unmarked grave sites at Nome Cemetery

By Diana Haecker

Northern Land Use Research Alaska conducted a penetrating radar survey to identify and map potentially unmarked graves. In the recently released report, a total of 96 anomalous sets were located that "hold the potential to be related to human burials."

This is no surprise to Nome officials. In order to plan for the growth of the cemetery, the City needed to find out where unmarked burial sites are. The project was identified in the City's Centennial Plan but has not been on the front burner.

City Manager Josie Bahnke said that when Sitnasuak Inc. brought Northern Land Use Research Alaska to do the radar survey at a different burial site, it made sense to have them survey the City Cemetery as well for unmarked graves

City Engineer John Blees is working on a conceptual design.

For 100 years or so, the Belmont Point Cemetery, as the City Cemetery is also known, has been a plot of land where families can bury their dead free of charge.

If death occurs in the wintertime, the bodies are stored in freezer units in the city's morgue. As soon as the ground thaws, burials can take place.

Since then, Osborne has been incarcerated at AMCC with brief releases to home during which time she violated probation conditions and had to return to jail.

Osborne also spent time in Anchorage in November and December awaiting a court-ordered evaluation to see if she was competent to assist in her defense against the charges. Psychiatric evaluation showed Osborne not competent to assist in her defense, with the possibility of returning to competency with medica-

The Jan. 3 hearing focused on what measures should occur to return Osborne to competency.

On Jan. 3, Osborne appeared via telephone from Anvil Mountain Correctional Center where she is currently in custody.

Assistant District Attorney Tom Jamgochian leaned toward keeping Osborne in custody and ordered to take prescription drugs to return her to competency to stand trial on the charges.

"Ms. Osborne's conduct of assaulting a correctional officer shows no assurance that if she gets out she won't go straight back to the high school or assault anyone who disagrees with her delusions," Jamgochian said.

"If she got to competency, and she pleaded out, we would have assurance. That is why the state is trying to make her competent.'

Alowa declined to keep Osborne another 30 days and require her to undergo intramuscular psychotropic medication.

Defense attorney Gilmore, on the other hand, continued to argue, as he has in other hearings, that incarceration was exacerbating his client's condition.

"Everything stems from that Ms. Osborne doesn't understand the situation she is in and continued incarceration is exacerbating her condition," Gilmore said. "Placement of orders on her is not effective as she doesn't comprehend them and cannot obey them.

He could not bring a plea offer to his client and have her understand a change of plea in exchange for a benefit, Gilmore said.

"My reading of Jackson v. Indiana (1972) and associated cases leads me to conclude that keeping her in jail any further on a misdemeanor packet of cases with no criminal history would be a violation of her due process." Alowa said.

"I am going to take the action of holding this in abeyance for one week to give the state a chance to seek a civil commitment. If that happens, it happens, and if it doesn't, it doesn't, but one week from today I'm going to dismiss the charges without."

Alowa said that it "had been an emotional case for everyone, especially people who were involved, so I don't make my decision lightly, and it is not my job to be popular.

"The whole reason we have competency rules -they came out of a person's Sixth Amendment right to be able to consult with their lawyer. When a person has been deemed mentally incompetent, as Ms. Osborne has, she doesn't have that

"Here we have someone with no criminal history, who, if she had been able to understand what was going on, may well have been out of jail a long time ago," Alowa said.

Families then have to make their own arrangements to excavate a site and to bury the body.

Except for a free burial permit from the city, which lists the responsible party, the name of the deceased, the date of birth and date of death, no formalities are necessary.

"We knew that our site was too small and that we are going to run out of space," said Cussy Kauer, a former city employee and cemetery volunteer.

With this in mind, City officials have begun to work on a plan to maximize the cemetery land overlooking Dry Creek.

In 2005, the City acquired 16 acres adjacent to the existing cemetery with the thought of expansion. "But as we look at expansion we also have to look at administration [of the cemetery]," Bahnke said. And that would be the end of the frontier style of burying the dead. Walking through the cemetery, there is a Irish section, in another place are Greek names, in another there were Oriental names. There is the Masonic section, the Catholic section and Methodists and Pioneers of Alaska. "And then there are those where somebody just threw you in the ground and didn't mark your grave," Kauer said. "There are no rules for permanently identifying graves."

Over the years, Cussy Kauer and Debbie Redburn have worked to build a data base of death records and tried to match them with grave sites. "We did a survey, with pen and paper we walked from grave to grave to record who was buried where," Kauer said. "Then we combined this, death records and obituaries in a data base."

ies in a data base." Kauer said Irene Kunnuk lead a youth program some 20 years ago that began cataloging the graves as a summer project.

In addition to building the data base, Kauer also works on the cemetery's beautification, on removing weeds from graves and doing research on the dead in Nome. This was not always a pleasant task as Kauer has had to content with vandals who demolished some beautification projects. One year, Kauer remembers, the Girl Scouts planted over 40 pine trees at the cemetery, but they were all ripped out by unknown individuals. Asked for the reasons of her labor of love, which often goes unnoticed, Kauer said, 'It's the history of the community! I always wanted to know who's out there.

Gravesites continue get lost because of overgrowth and sinking soil. Sometimes information on the wooden crosses is rendered illegible.

"We have lots of inquiries from folks outside of Nome," said Kauer. When people call City Hall asking for help to find grandpa or grandma, they sometimes are lucky because of Kauer's data base and obituary col-

She made a discovery when cleaning up her own grandfather's grave, finding a metal plate with his information that had sunk into the soil a few inches and disappeared from sight. A friend with a metal detector went along the row of graves and detected seven or eight more of those plates that the undertaker at that time had placed on the burial sites.

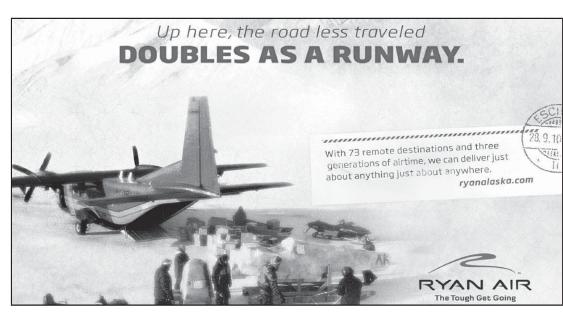

The City initiated land surveys, to have property corners monumented and the easement used by the Federal Aviation Administration for lights leading to the airport flagged.

Nanooks basketball closes 2013 with Alumni Tournament

By Sarah Miller

The Den of the Mighty Nanooks welcomed returning alumni to face off against the current JV and Varsity teams in the annual Alumni Basketball Tournament on December 27-28. Three teams of alumni men and two teams of alumni women participated in the single elimination tournament. The alumni teams were composed of graduates from various years and were put together in random assignment, requiring players to quickly adjust to an unfamiliar team, and assess the strengths and skills of teammates while in play to develop strategies.

Jeff Lyon, a NBHS graduate of 1993, participated in the tournament for the fourth year, and after his team lost by one point to the boys' varsity team, commented on the varsity team's athleticism and toughness. The boys' teams were equally complimentary of the alumni players. Sophomore Bobby Pate (#12) and senior Matthew Tunley (#22) commented: "It is a lot of fun to play against guys who came before us. It's challenging to play against smarter and more experienced players. We just had to run all the plays, work hard, hustle, and go for easy lay-ups."

Bragging rights ultimately went to both the boys' and girls' varsity teams as they held off alumni in the championship games. Pat Callahan, athletic director for NBHS and boys' varsity coach, has organized the tournament for a number of years for the enjoyment of alumni as well as a method to keep his team conditioned during winter break. "The tournament is for fun, it's not too high stakes. I play the whole team to give them experience. It's fun to see former players I've coached on the court again," he stated.

Members of the girls' varsity team appreciate the opportunity to improve their game by playing against unfamiliar opposition. "It's good to play other teams since you don't know what to expect. It forces you to change your defensive strategy. You also begin to notice your weaknesses when you start playing different teams," commented senior Ariana Horner.

Both varsity teams also competed in the Service High School Tip-Off in Anchorage over winter vacation. The boys' team played East High School first. Despite a game-high performance of 25 points scored by Cass Mattheis, and a respectable 20 point contribution by Tyler Eide, the victory went to the Thunderbirds by five points (73-68).

The Lady Nanooks went up against Palmer High School, with 21 of the team's 38 points scored by Addy Ahmasuk, but it was not enough to bring home a win. On the second day of the tournament, both the boys' and girls' teams played Eagle River High School. Nome dominated with scores of 64-46 (boys) and 62-37 (girls). Leading scorers included Eide with 18 points, Daniel Head with 17, and Mattheis with 13 points.

On the girls' teams, both Addy Ahmasuk and Senora Ahmasuk contributed 19 points and Ariana Horner scored 12. Addy Ahmasuk noted the participation of several of the freshman girls in the tournament as a contributing factor in the victory over Eagle River and commented that the girls are seeing progress and improvement in every game.

Next on the calendar for NBHS basketball is the Subway Showdown, scheduled for January 9-11 at

US Senator seeks input on MSA draft plan to improve national fisheries

House Natural Resources Committee Chairman Doc Hastings last month unveiled a draft proposal to reauthorize the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, which was last authorized by Congress in 2006 through fiscal year 2013.

The draft proposal, Strengthening Fishing Communities and Increasing Flexibility in Fisheries Management Act, would renew and amend the Magnuson-Stevens Act - which governs the recreational and commercial harvest of fisheries in Federal waters - to implement common sense reforms that will promote increased flexibility and transparency, improve data collection, create jobs, and give predictability and certainty to the coastal communities that depend on stable fishing activities. Click here for a copy of the draft proposal.

The Natural Resources Committee has held eight hearings over the past three years related to fisheries management and the reauthorization of the Magnuson-Stevens Act.

"The purpose of this draft proposal is to gather public input and to see how to best improve and modernize this important law governing fisheries. This proposal would give regional fishery managers increased flexibility to deal with the complexity of fishery issues and provide economic stability and certainty to fishermen and fishery dependent communities. It also would improve data collection and increase transparency so that management decisions are based on sound science and all who are impacted by this law can have an active role in the process.

'The Magnuson-Stevens Act has enabled the U.S. to have the best managed fisheries in the world and has been instrumental in providing a framework for allowing regions to address their own unique challenges. Yet, as the Committee has heard at multiple oversight hearings, many fishermen and coastal communities that depend on healthy fisheries are currently facing challenges - including sudden severe cuts to quotas, rising costs, and restrictive fishing seasons. I believe there are updates to the law that should be considered that will address these concerns and ensure there is a proper balance between the biological needs of fish and the economic needs of fishermen," said Chairman Hastings.

The draft proposal, while maintaining the key themes of the Act, would make the following improvements:

managers when rebuilding depleted fisheries; Provide flexibility for fishery managers when setting annual catch levels;

• Provide more transparency for

· Provide flexibility for fishery

• Provide more transparency for fishermen and others in both science and management;

 Provide more predictability and stability for fishermen and fisherydependent communities;

• Allow fishery managers to take the economic impact of their decisions into account when setting harvest levels and developing rebuilding

 Allow fishery managers to take environmental conditions into account when establishing harvest levels and developing rebuilding plans; • Allow fishermen in regions where catch share programs have been controversial to have a say in whether a new catch share program will be implemented and to be provided better information when considering such a program;

 Provide a schedule for obtaining better fishery dependent and fishery independent data especially for data poor fisheries and provide greater protection for confidential information submitted to regulatory agencies

Since the 16 acres bought are the New Zealand Mine Placer, there has been some mineralization detected and mining the area prior to its use as an expanded cemetery is not off the table, said Bahnke. The City also prepared a topographical field map of the area.

"The problem now is that we're running out of places to dig and put people," said Kauer. "That forces the hand of the City. We've been doing it that way for 100 years. We as a community need to come together and say 'This is what we want for our cemetery and these are the rules'," Kauer said.

What are her hopes for the place? "I have high hopes," said Kauer. "I want it to get marked and laid out. I want family plots big enough where they all can be buried together. We all turn to dust in the end, we all go into the same place but it wouldn't it be nice for Caroline Reader to be surrounded by her children?"

Audubon Christmas Bird Count: Nome area birds surprise local birders

By Peter Bente

Despite below zero temperatures, a number of Nomeites joined together on Saturday, December 28 to count a surprising array of bird species within the Christmas Bird Count (CBC) area centered on Nome, Alaska. A collective group of 19 people traveled by vehicle, snowmachine, dog team, on foot, or watched bird feeders to find a grand total of 8 species and 237 individual birds in the 15-mile circle designated as the Nome count area.

One waterfowl species, a single red-breasted merganser found inhabiting open-water sections of the Nome River, has never been recorded on previous Nome counts which date back to 1970 when the first count was completed. Waterpunctuated by heavy rain and other rain-on-snow events, have changed snow to ice and probably contributed to lower numbers of this snowadapted species. The Christmas count happens every year so trends become evident when species numbers are compared through time.

fowl are likely to be present when mild weather or strong north winds contribute to open-water conditions along local waterways and coastal areas, probably good reasons why 35 common eiders and 1 glaucous gull were spotted foraging in marine water quite close to the Ft. Davis Roadhouse 2 days before the official count day. Any species seen three days before or three days after count day are not added to the count of individual birds, but they do become the list of 'count week species' present in the count area. In the past, there have been 24 species of waterfowl, raptors, and songbirds present during the winter counts in Nome.

To begin the count, about 14 people gathered about 11 a.m. at NW Campus to learn about the counting rules and recent observations of local birds. Then the group scattered to calm, sunny conditions along local roads and trails to find a total of 50 eiders, 2 gyrfalcons, 21 willow ptarmigan, 15 unidentified ptarmigan, 12 rock pigeons, 117 common ravens, 3 snow buntings, and 16 McKay's bunting in addition to the rare merganser noted above. At the onset of darkness the count ended with a total of 21 hours of searching and 241 miles of travel recorded by the separate groups.

Ravens are the most obvious winter species and are highly active covering broad areas during the daylight hours. This species has been seen on every previous count and to avoid double counting, one group focused on finding ravens by visiting the landfill, preferred roosting areas, and counting from a vehicle that moved from east to west across the area. The current count of 117 ravens is dramatically lower that the highest count of 730 birds in 2006, probably the result of a change in landfill management practices. Ptarmigan, another common winter species, were tallied at 36, which is far less than the 292 birds counted in 2001. # How to enjoy exercise at a thinking pace

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Want to lose weight, lower your cholesterol, prevent heart disease, and grow brain cells this year? Try light exercise. Medical experts agree that many modern health problems such as diabetes, heart disease, high blood pressure, strokes, and even dementia can be prevented with a daily dose of physical activ-

But how hard do you have to work to see a benefit?

It turns out that mere moderate-intensity exercise, enough to increase the heart rate and cause a light sweat, is all that is required to turn on the body's protective mechanisms for the heart and brain.

More intense exercises such as those performed by athletes may be beneficial for improving aerobic fitness. They may give an athlete a winning edge, but this high-intensity physical activity is not necessary to improve overall health.

Moderate-intensity exercise has been shown to lower blood fats, raise good HDL-cholesterol and lower bad LDL-cholesterol. Light exercise lowers blood sugar to healthy levels and leads to weight loss. People who take insulin for diabetes find that exercise lowers the amount of insulin needed for treatment.

Exercise can make you smarter. Studies show that men and women who remain physically active throughout life, starting in childhood, score higher on mental tests at age 50 compared to sedentary people. MRI brain scans of elderly persons who participate in daily moderate-intensity exercise show that the brain increases in volume in response to physical activity.

The goal is to exercise at a moderate pace for at least 30 minutes a day. The definition of a moderate pace varies from person to person and largely depends on general conditioning. Some people experience fatigue at walking only 3-4 miles per hour while a marathon runner may feel this pace is uncomfortably slow, ALASKA not even breaking a sweat.

FAMILY The focus of DOCTOR moderate exercise is not on speed but on heart rate. Moderate-intensity exercise is achieved at a heart rate roughly equal to 70 percent of your maximum heart rate, the heart rate at which your brain will not allow you to go faster or harder.

Determining your actual maximum heart rate requires specialized equipment, most commonly a medical treadmill stress test.

A quick way to estimate your maximum heart rate without having to perform the treadmill test is to subtract your age from 220. This gives you a predicted maximum heart rate for your age. For example, a 55-year-old would have a predicted maximum heart rate of 165 beats per minute (220-55 = 165)

Moderate-intensity exercise would be 70 percent of this amount, about 115 bpm. Therefore a 55year-old will benefit from exercise when his or her heart rate is raised to around 115 beats per minute for about 30 minutes a day.

But there is another way to determine your personal healthy pace. It involves finding your "thinking pace." This is the pace at which you can exercise for an extended period while thinking about other things. In some cases exercise at the thinking pace stimulates the creative thinking process. Ever had a serendipitous idea while walking?

While walking or running at a thinking pace you are able to solve problems, make plans, or even read books (preferably on stationary exercise equipment such as a treadmill or elliptical machine). While walking with a friend at the thinking pace, you should be able to carry on a conversation without difficulty.

But if you push the pace faster, there is a level of exertion at which you cannot think about much else other than mentally pushing forward. This is the point at which exercise ceases to be "fun" and becomes as much a test of mental stamina as physical stamina.

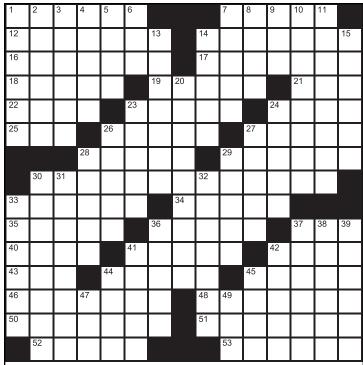

Slow down just a bit, and you return to an enjoyable pace at which you can again think about other things. This is your thinking pace.

It turns out that this thinking pace is the pace at which the health benefits of exercise begin. And this pace, your thinking pace, correlates almost perfectly with a heart rate in the moderate-intensity category. In fact, a patient undergoing treadmill testing often quits talking or telling stories (thinking about other things) when the heart rate passes 70 percent of his or her maximum predicted.

Over time your thinking pace will improve. Your body will be conditioned to tolerate faster speeds at which you can still think as you continue daily exercise. For example, after several months of conditioning a person who once only walked at 4 mph will be able to maintain the same heart rate with a slow jog, or a runner will be able to speed up from 9 minutes per mile to 8 min/mile while maintaining a moderate-intensity heart-rate.

If doing something for your health is on your resolution list this year, but you find it hard to think of changes you would enjoy, consider going for a walk. If your pace is right, I am sure you will think of something.

He died December 22, 2013 at Anchorage, after having complications from several illnesses. Norbert was always very proud to say that he was born in a sod house and born premature because he was born in May instead of August when he was supposed to.

Norbert is survived by his sisters Rose Okbaok of Teller, Rita Kakaruk in Seattle, and Sarah Kakaruk of Teller. He also has several cousins, nieces, nephews, great nieces and great nephews and great-great nieces and great-great nephews, too numerous to name.

He was known to most everyone as "Uncle Norbert."

Norbert was preceded in death by his parents David and Annie Kakaruk, his brothers Peter Kakaruk, Edward J. Kakaruk and infant brother Milton J. Kakaruk. His sisters are Johanna Topkok, Mary Killarzoac, Maggie Wilson, Irene Kakaruk, Agnes Okleasik, Lucy Craig, Dorothy Isabell and Sarah A.

Saying It Sincerely

By Pastor Harvey J Fiskeaux Member of the Nome Ministerial Association "Redeeming the Time"

A few days ago we celebrated the beginning of a new year. An old song says: "Time keeps on slipping, slipping, into the future." As a matter of perspective, the older we grow, the faster time seems to move. When I was a kid, it seemed Christmas would never come. Now, the years seem to be flying by so quickly

There is a Biblical admonition that says we would be wise to redeem the time, because the days are evil (Ephesians 5:16). I believe the meaning of this word is to make the most of every opportunity afforded us to choose the right and live according to the will of God. Theologians call our earthly time "probation." The meaning is that we have been gifted with an opportunity to decide how we will relate to God. We have two choices; receive him on his terms or reject him and bear the consequences of separation from him.

Yesterday is gone forever, and tomorrow may never come. So, we have this moment to make decisions that will affect the rest of our life here and for all eternity.

Take the angels! They had a probationary time to decide their fate. Jude tells us they "kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day" (Jude 6). They had a time to make the decision to stay in heaven with God or to be banished from him forever. A third of them chose the option of disobedience and are now called fallen angels destined for damnation.

How about Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden? Their probation was in the Garden with a single tree. God gave them opportunity to make the decision to obey or reject his command. They chose to eat from the forbidden fruit and consequently were banished from the garden because of their blatant disobedience.

Then there was Jesus during his temptation. Luke tells us that the Spirit led him into the wilderness for a time of testing (Luke 4:1). Three times Satan tempted him to compromise God's will for his life. Three times Jesus refused those temptations and victoriously returned from that experience in the power of the Spirit (Luke 4:14). He used his probationary time to prepare to be God's holy sacrificial lamb on the cross for our redemption.

John the Revelator informs us of a future moment when an angel announces to earth inhabitants that "time" or "opportunity" shall be no more (Revelation 10:6). What does that mean? Well, I believe it means that you and I have this "time" to choose what we will do with Jesus who is called the Messiah or Christ. This is our probationary time, a gift from God. We will not always have this precious gift. It is a fleeting commodity. There will come a day when this door of salvation will close forever. God has given us this gift of time on earth to receive his only begotten Son as our personal Savior (John 3:16). We only have the present moment to decide. What will you do with your time? The clock is ticking.

Board of Game to hear proposals

By Diana Haecker

Several proposals to address the overpopulation of bears and to create better moose hunt opportunities will be pondered by the Board of Game when the body meets to discuss Arctic and Western region issues in Kotzebue from January 10 through 13.

Addressing the increase in bear sightings in Nome proper and an increase in bears seen in the countryside around Nome, several Nome based organizations have proposed a change in the season and bag limit for brown bear in Game Unit 22. According to the proposal, there is an overpopulation of brown bears in Unit 22C; as hunters only seeing sows with four and even five cubs. Bears are breaking into cabins and stealing food from meat drying racks. This year, two bears were shot within Nome city limits after the bears had been seen rummaging through dumpsters and roaming human neighborhoods.

The proposal asks for a bag limit of one brown bear per regulatory year and for opening the season from April 1 to May 31 and from August 1 to October 31.

The proposal was submitted by Sitnasuak Native Corp., Kawerak Inc., King Island Native Corp. and Nome Eskimo Community.

Current ADF&G regulations for unit area 22C allow a sport hunter to take one bear every four regulatory years. The open season of the general spring hunt is currently set from May 1 to May 31. The fall hunt is open from August 1 to Oct. 31.

A subsistence hunt allows hunters to take one bear per year, during the same open season dates as the general hunt. Subsistence hunters must salvage the meat for food, but are not required to bring in the hide and skull for sealing, unless the parts are taken outside of the game unit. Very few bears are taken in Unit 22C under a subsistence hunt permit. Regulations are based on the most recent bear population survey conducted 1989-1991. Biologists conducted a so-called "capture, mark and resight study." They captured bears, radio-collared them and at later dates flew surveys to re-sight the radio-collared bears. The study was done in an area encompassing 798 square miles north of Nome. The biologists sighted 30 bears in that area. This number computed a density of 37.8 bears per 1,000 square miles. But that is more than 20 years ago. Since then, several other attempts were made to conduct surveys, but they failed to produce valid data. An ADF&G survey in cooperation with the National summer but fell short of producing usable results because of inclement weather.

Moose

The Native Village of Wales submitted a proposal to change the hunting season and bag limit for moose in unit 22E. The proposal asks for a hunt from March 1 until March 31 instead of a January hunt. The reasoning is that the change would give hunters safer access to hunting areas with longer daylight and better traveling conditions. "Winter travel to the Unit 22E moose hunting areas is extremely difficult early in the winter with frequent storms and very short daylight in which to safely hunt and travel," reads the proposal. An added benefit would be to allow residents fresh meat toward the end of winter as freezer contents begin to dwindle. The proposal would benefit Wales and Shishmaref residents.

THIS IS HOW IT WORKS—Senator Donny Olson explained funding mechanisms to the public during a legislative update meeting at Nome City Council chambers on Monday, Jan. 6.

Source: Alaska Redistricting Board

2013 PROCLAMATION HOUSE DISTRICTS (top)— The statewide map shows House Districts under the current plan, which was adopted by the Alaska Redistricting Board last month.

FUTURE OF THE ARCTIC (right) — Rep. Neal Foster explains in a powerpoint presentation the new realities of marine traffic along the Northern Sea Route.

Projects that have region-wide support, present a unified front and have statewide benefit stand a chance to be funded.

Redistricting

Rep. Foster briefly described the newly adopted House and Senate District map. The map for the 2012 election cycle gave House Rep. Foster a huge swath of land from the Bering Sea all the way to the Canadian border has last December been replaced with a final map that is closer to the district boundaries prior to the 2010 census and redistricting effort. House District 39 includes the Bering Sea, Norton Sound villages, plus Shishmaref in the North, Ruby in the East and Hooper Bay in the South. Instead of 67 villages, the district now encompasses 35 communities. Senate District T is comprised of House Districts 39 and 40, the entire Northwest Arctic Borough and North Slope Borough.

Arctic Infrastructure

Rep. Foster gave an overview of increased marine traffic, showing a map that illustrated how the shipping industry benefits from the shorter distance between Europe and Asia via the Northern Sea Route and the Bering Strait as opposed to the long way through the Mediterranean, the Suez Canal and then having to dodge Somalian pirates at the Horn of Africa. China sent their first super cargo ship through the route and proved that it can be done. Foster said that the benefits for the shipping industry are obvious and other countries are actively preparing for a Northern Sea Route reality. "But what about us? How can we benefit from this?" All the buzz about the opening Arctic will be helpful to get funds for infrastructure improvements at the port of Nome.

Constituent requests

Norton Sound Health Corporation employees comprised most of the dozen people present at the Legislative update. NSHC employees Phil Hofstetter, Chris Hanson, Elsie Vaden and Mike Owens presented Rep. Foster and Sen. Olson with the health corporation's legislative priorities, including renovations and expansions of village health clinics in Gambell, Savoonga and Little Diomede.

Understanding the reality that several health organizations statewide are in the same boat to compete for limited funds, Stan Andersen – City representative on the NSHC board of directors – suggested to team up with other region's health corporations to form a stronger lobbying effort for health care issues. NSHC also asked the legislators for $2 million to design a new building adjacent to the new hospital that would house a Wellness Center, a Health Aide Training Center and assisted living facilities.

"It is frustrating to me to see need and to know how many communities need better clinics," said Foster. "How do you get an Anchorage legislator to understand that we're asking for the basics here. We're not asking for a tennis court, but for the very basics."

Tim Smith asked the legislators to convince somehow the Dept. of Fish and Game to get behind salmon hatcheries. "If we don't do something, I believe, we will see the end of king salmon in our life time."

The Legislature will convene in Juneau on January 21. Sen. Olson and Rep. Foster expect the upcoming session to be a contentious one due to stark budget realities that are amplified by the controversial SB 21 that passed last year, but voters are to decide in this year's elections if the law should be repealed.

Youth gets big share of NSEDC money

By Sandra L. Medearis

Eighteen groups participated in the NSEDC end-of-the-year Community Benefit funding rally at a Nome Common Council work session Jan.9.

After Monday night's regular Council meeting, 10 of the groups came out with $134,270 more to spend on good deeds.

The Council unanimously approved the following proposals to partake of the $150,000 given to Nome as a share of fishing proceeds from the Bering Sea and Aleutian Island areas:

Nome Covenant Church Checkpoint Youth Center, $12,000; Nome Preschool Association, $5,000

(scholarships); Youth Education Services (Summerfest), $3,200; Nome Wrestling Team (new mats), $16,000; NSHC Injury Prevention Program, $4,850; N.E.S.T., $10,000 (to conduct a housing needs survey, which fits neatly into the Nome Planning Commission's strategic plan); Nome Ski and Biathlon 2014 (new equipment), $5,000; Nome Public Schools, $65,978; NCC, NEC and NSHC CAMP Dept., $10,000 (to stage youth camps); Paws of Nome, $2,242.70 (for constructing insulated dog houses, leashes, chains, collars), for a total of $134,270.70.

After a search that nearly lasted two days, Nome Search and Rescue volunteers found the body of missing Frank Okleasik Sr. half submerged in a slough near the Nome River at 5 p.m. on Thursday, January 9. He was declared deceased at the Alaska State Troopers were notified at 6:06 p.m. on Wednesday, January 8 that Okleasik, 74, was overdue returning home from a fishing trip to the Nome River. Okleasik had left his house at 11 a.m. and when he didn't return by 3 p.m. as usual, a family member went to look for him at 4 p.m. and found Okleasik's truck parked at the end of Wally's Way, an access road to a gold mine near mile 4 of the Beam

The troopers notified the Nome Volunteer Fire Department's Search and Rescue and sent a hasty team. "His intention was to go fishing, so we searched the area from his truck to the river," said NVFD assistant chief Jerry Steiger.

On Wednesday evening, 20 volunteers searched the area on snowmachines until 11:30 p.m. Weather conditions that day proved challenging because of snow, wind and drifting snow.

NVFD stood up a command center at the Nome Fire Hall, from where the search was coordinated. On Thursday morning volunteers resumed the search at 8 a.m. with snowmachine teams.

NEW LOOK - State leasing and facilities manager Tanci Mintz points to the design of the Nome State Office Building after renovations will be completed. An onsite pre-bid meeting took place on Thursday, Jan. 9.

By Diana Haecker

With an invitation to bids, the State of Alaska has initiated tangible steps for a complete make-over of the State Office Building in Nome.

The Alaska Dept. of Administration issued a public notice on December 24 that opened an invitation to bid on that rather big job to completely renovate the 40-year-old building. Last week, there were two pre-bid meetings held in Anchorage and Nome.

The Nome meeting included a walk through the building with State Leasing and Facilities Manager Tanci Mintz of the Alaska Department of Administration. Mintz said there were approximately six firms that attended the meeting in Anchorage and a total of 15 people representing five or six firms participated in the walk-through on Thursday,

The Legislature has funded the project with just over $12 million since fiscal year 2009.

At one point, the state's administration considered construction of a new state office building, but then changed its mind because renovations seemed less expensive.

As outlined to contractors, the scope of work involves interior demolition, reconstruction, and upgrading the entire building, inside and

Floor plans and a computer generated graphic of the building shows the building's exterior in green panels, with a gallery of windows on the second floor.

Tanci Mintz said some elements in the design could yet be changed.

"The idea is to have an energy efficient building and to keep costs down," Mintz said.

The entire building will be gutted and rebuilt, including replacement of electrical wiring.

The Anchorage architects Bezek, Durst and Seiser were awarded the design contract. According to floor plans displayed at the lobby of the building on Thursday, the building will have a complete new look. "We completely replace the envelope, all windows and doors," said Mintz.

Dear Editor,

Pots and Kettles!

The only proverbs that I can conjure up to accurately describe the current economic disparity between Congress and We Common People these days is the one about the golden pot that was forever calling the rusting teakettle black! And although, in all honesty, many financially hurting Americans probably have far more cutting descriptions to draw upon when describing the damaging economic actions of a few of those within government, censors would never allow them to be printed, in my opinion?

Yet another sad thought to consider is the fact that over half of the same caring (?) public servants who are now pushing for further cuts to the less than affluent, are themselves millionaires, and they just may be the poorer half of that gaggle of political bon vivants!

Of course if you listen to most of them (politicians), they will forever try to convince you that they are in politics merely to benefit this nation and her noble people? And if you believe that, then you will also believe that the Soviets, Iranians, and the North Koreans alike, are really our loving, long-lost brethren from Noah's Ark?

H. Rick Tavares Campo, California, 91906

Hi there people, I hope this finds you all doing well. Probably glad like me that the expense of the holidays is past, at least we fared it well.

I'm just glad my kids are home and safe, even if they might be stressing me out a little. One asks why do you guys keep bugging me? So I say because we missed you.

Although some people think the holidays means its time to party, that isn't always so. It is supposed to be for getting people closer togetherto play a game, or watch a game, or bake together, or something together. It's supposed to be the togetherness that counts.

Just like, I seriously wonder if a person really loves a person, when they drink and put the other person down or beat the other person up. That does not show love, so you should ask yourself—do I really love him/her? Then why do I do that? You're supposed to treat the person the way you did when you first started going out. If you took them places, don't forget to keep taking them places, that's probably what they enjoyed doing with you. Just because kids/jobs came along doesn't mean the other person wouldn't mind taking a break and doing that

The Saturday Market has been doing well this past month. I was teasing the ladies that if they wouldn't pick a Saturday I'd tell the IRA we're doing it every Saturday in January, so that's what we're doing. It takes place at the Community Hall from noon to 3 or 4 p.m. Tables are open for any one who would like to sell anything.

I also asked the board to have game nights, and the Eskimo Dancing (if I had drums) nights. Yea thanks to my sister I could have 11 sets of dice to play Yahtzee or 10,000, quyanna buk, sis. I also have four decks or so of cards that we could have snerts or cribbage tournaments with. I wonder-do you think you could win me? I'm pretty good you know. I don't mind winning or losing—it's the interaction with people that counts.

May God bless you all in the New Year. Remember, you can be whatever you would like to be, just need to put a little effort into more schooling to be that person, you just need to want it.

Don't forget to tell people where you are going if you decide to travel, and dress/take extra clothing-cause you can always take some off, along with some food-you never know what might happen.

Take care everyone. As always, Karen Nanouk Unalakleet, AK 99684

Dear Nancy,

I just wanted to take this time to recognize how awesome the management and staff at the Stebbins Native Store (ANICA) is doing. Since they have been on board, I have seen a significant change in the products the store has to offer.

There have been new upright glass freezers installed offering a more variety of meats, vegetables, desserts and ready bake items. The produce section has grown by at least 60%, its nice to have bell peppers, green onions and even avocados to choose from the standard potatoes and onions. I also see a selection of blankets, pillows and household goods; there is even a small section of toys for children.

I think it was smart of them to install a decent security system. What the store loses in profit often gets passed down to the customer, creating higher prices here and there.

I appreciate the open minds of the management team and the experience they have to offer. I know it's not easy to make significant changes to a mundane environment. I think they are doing great. Keep up the great work.

The Volunteer Spirit

In times of emergency the people of Nome are exceptional in their efforts to roll up their sleeves and lend a hand. The recent search efforts for a cherished member of our community give tribute to what we can call the "Volunteer Spirit of the North." It gives us all pride in the cohesiveness of our town.

We can be proud that our emergency medical and search and rescue organizations are well trained and coordinated. We can be thankful that so many of our townspeople are willing to give their time and talents to spend long, cold, dark hours searching for those who are lost. We can be grateful that our neighbors are willing to jump into their firefighting boots or put their emergency medical training to work to save lives and property, or to put closure to a loss.

Many of our friends and neighbors spend unheralded hours as a volunteer firefighter or as ambulance personnel. Many go out of the warmth of their homes and into miserable weather conditions to find missing people, conduct life saving medical responses, or to fight fires and saves lives and property. Many spend hours in training, others man the coordination centers, operate communication equipment and make coffee. On behalf of our entire community we extend gratitude for the volunteers who make Nome a fantastic community. — N.L.M.—

Senator Murkowski blocks marine planning for Alaska

As part of a report on the newlyreleased 2014 Interior Appropriations bill, Senator Lisa Murkowski says she was fighting off a number of funding threats to Alaska priorities and protecting core Alaska concerns like fisheries, land management and suicide prevention.

One item Sen. Murkowski reports to have been instrumental in was blocking Coastal Marine Special Planning in Alaska. The Senator wrote that Alaskans are against CMSP, linking a website of the Alaska Chamber of Commerce with that claim. Senator Murkowski was told by then-acting NOAA Secretary Blank earlier this year that states not wanting to participate in the program wouldn't have to do so. Murkowski supported language in the budget prohibiting Interior Department funds from being used for CMSP in and around Alaska.

According to the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, coastal and marine special planning offers comprehensive and integrated approach to managing uses and activities at the regional

It is supposed to use sound science and the best available information at the heart of decision-making and brings federal, state, tribal, and other partners together to cooperatively develop coastal and marine spatial plans. This process is designed to decrease user conflict, improve planning and regulatory efficiencies, decrease associated costs and delays. engage affected communities and stakeholders, and preserve critical ecosystem functions and services.

Marine planning is designed as a science-based tool that regions can use to address specific ocean management challenges and advance their economic development and conservation objectives. Marine planning would support regional actions and decision-making and adregionally determined priorities, based on the needs, interests, and capacity of a given region.

Just as federal agencies work with states, tribes, local governments, and users of forests and grasslands, marine planning would provide a more coordinated and responsive federal presence and the opportunity for all coastal and ocean interests in a region to share information and coordinate activities. This will promote more efficient and effective decisionmaking and enhance regional economic, environmental, social, and cultural well-being. In turn, regional actions will support national objectives to grow the ocean economy, increase regulatory efficiency and consistency, and reduce adverse impacts to environmentally sensitive

According to the White House National Ocean Council's website, states, tribes, and Regional Fishery Management Councils may choose to participate on regional planning bodies established in accordance with the President's National Ocean Policy Executive Order, the implementation plan and guidance to be released by the National Ocean Council. State, tribal, and Fishery Management Council participation on regional planning bodies is voluntary. Should all States within a region choose not to participate in a regional planning body within their region, a regional planning body will not be established.

Instead, federal agencies will identify and address priority science, information, and ocean management issues associated with marine planning as described in the Executive Order.

Federal agencies will coordinate with non-federal partners and authorities, including states, federallyrecognized tribes and Fishery Management Councils, and stakeholders, to ensure that federal actions support and advance both regional and national objectives.

Radiation scare unwarranted

The LA Times reports that radiation detected off the U.S. West Coast from the Fukushima Daiichi nuclear plant in Japan has declined since the 2011 tsunami disaster.

According to scientists, radiation levels never approached levels that could pose a risk to human health, seafood or wildlife.

A flurry of online videos and blog posts circulate social media outlets, stating that radiation from the nuclear plant has contaminated western US beaches and sea life across the

"There is no public health risk at California beaches due to radioactivity related to events at Fukushima," the California Department of Public Health said in a statement.

Scots help preserve Yup'ik artifacts

The Scotsman newspaper reports that a Scottish-led effort to save one of the world's best-preserved examples of a lost society has been boosted by a major £1 million research grant. Since 2009, archaeologists from Aberdeen University have helped to preserve precious artifacts contained at Quinhagak, a 700 yearold Eskimo village in Western Alaska, which is in danger of being washed into the sea.

The researchers were first called in five years ago to carry out a rescue dig after the frozen coastline began to erode as a result of global warming.

The dig is revealing never seen before artifacts as well as providing clues to how past societies in the remote area dealt with climate change and how global warming could affect mankind in the future.

The team was awarded a grant of £1.1million from the Arts and Humanities Research Council to finance the vital dig for another four years, but also to fund local archaeological education and training initiatives as well as a regional survey to find more sites, which could also be under threat.

President announces sweeping energy review

Last week, President Barack Obama ordered a review of the nation's energy strategy that will involve departments and agencies across the federal government, reports the Washington D.C. news outlet The Hill.

The review is part of the president's climate change agenda. The so-called Quadrennial Energy Review will focus on the nation's infrastructure. As crude oil domestic production reaches a near 20-year high, and the natural-gas industry continues to boom, the U.S. must address its aging infrastructure, the White House said in a statement on Thursday, Jan. 9.

The announcement came when heated discussions occurred over whether the U.S. should transport crude oil via railcar or pipeline, and whether the nation's electric grid is ready for the onslaught from renewable energy sources.

Thursday's order establishes the task force of federal agencies that will participate in drafting the re-

Alowa said she would hold the case in abeyance for a week while the state tried to achieve a civil commitment. Then she would dismiss the charges without prejudice.

Osborne went to Anchorage for treatment Jan. 11 under a Title 47 mental health commitment statute.

The case has been ongoing while the court and Osborne's family dealt with Osborne's incompetence to assist in her own defense and failure to comply with release conditions.

Osborne's attorney, Chester Gilmore of Bethel argued that Osborne's mental condition rendered her unable to understand her situation and the orders and conditions she received upon several releases from jail. Therefore, she could not comply. Extended custody, during which Osborne stayed in isolation. exacerbated her illness, Gilmore

At the Jan. 3 status hearing, Alowa said she would hold the dismissals for a week to give the State of Alaska a chance to arrange for a civil commitment for treatment.

Alowa acknowledged that a serious factor in the case was the community's fear and concern that she would be released.

Unless she appears in court again and her health is discussed in open session, Osborne's health records remain confidential and sealed according to the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA).

Records generated by a psychological competency evaluation in Anchorage have been sealed, but according to court discussion on record, Osborne was found currently incompetent to assist in her own defense against the charges.

She could perhaps return to competency by taking prescription med-

Troopers authorized the charter of a Bering Air R44 helicopter to conduct an aerial search as well. As soon as daylight broke, the helicopter was in the air to look for Okleasik.

'We also put a small boat in the river with an underwater camera,' said Steiger.

Steiger said that the search was conducted with teams on snowmachine, walking on snowshoes, two searchers in the boat and two onboard the helicopter. Around 3 p.m. 32 people walked downstream on the banks of the Nome River. Troopers say, a total of 70 volunteers were involved in the search. Okleasik has been routinely fishing at that particular spot. He is known as an experienced outdoorsman.

The Army National Guard provided two Small Unit Support Vehicles that were used to warm the ground searchers. A Nome Volunteer Ambulance crew was there as well.

Around 5 p.m. searchers located Okleasik about 350 yards away from his truck. He had broken through hollow shelf ice over an air pocket on a slough between a lake and the Nome River. He was half-submerged in flowing water. The searchers found him drifted in, with the tip of a long ice pick protruding out of the Troopers don't suspect foul play. Okleasik's body was sent to the State Medical Examiner's Office for an autopsy, according to the troopers report.

Memorial services are to be held on Saturday, Jan. 18 at 2 p.m. at Our Savior's Lutheran Church.

Groups want NSEDC cash to oil squeaky wheels

By Sandra L. Medearis

On Jan. 10, the Nome Common Council in a work session entertained pitches from 18 groups seeking money from NSEDC's annual Community Benefit Share.

This year, $150,000 headed Nome's way to boost the local quality of life.

The Council met NSEDC's requirement that each of the 15 communities receiving the annual funds gather community input on how to divide up the money and put it to good use.

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. has distributed more than $20 million through the program since 1999.

The Council required groups to turn in proposals by a Jan. 5 deadline

Those who had been funded in the past had to include an account of how they had spent the money. The Council cannot vote during a work session, but they reached consensus favoring a basket of projects worth

From comments passed on the projects and presentations, one would not be surprised if all the youth-centered projects flew to the funding finish, but all projects collected positive comment.

a request for $143,601 to help buy and operate a maritime firefighting search and rescue boat.

"The City needs a blue-water vessel for firefighting 24/7," Kosto told the panel.

The City already has a search-andrescue boat, the Guardian, he added, but "nobody schedules fires. It takes time to get [equipment] onto the Guardian."

The Council acknowledged the need for a firefighting boat, but several found the cost better suited to a legislative appropriation.

STRAIT Fuel, LLC, drew on the NSEDC 2012 annual report underlining its purpose to develop and sustain economic activity, with one priority being to lower the cost of fuel, according to presenter Douglas E. Doherty. If the Council were to award STRAIT's request for $139,583 to buy fuel storage and dispensing equipment, customers of their discount heating fuel company could save $1.08 per gallon, thus stimulating Nome's economy. The City of Nome and the community would benefit exponentially, according to Doherty.
"Many frustrations have been no-

"Many frustrations have been noticed recently with many Nome residents feeling forced to leave due to the high cost of living here," Doherty said. The company would buy their fuel from NSEDC's Consolidated Bulk Fuel Program at a 0 percent interest rate.

The project would start with a 20,000 fuel tank. None of the award money would go to payroll, but all to infrastructure. Doherty projected a savings of $799,200 by consumers and increased tax revenues to the City over 12 years.

The Council pooh-poohed the 20,000-gallon tank as an insignificant volume. Doherty responded that one such tank could lead to two, three and four tanks, encouraging existing fuel companies to find savings and efficiencies in order to lower their retail fuel prices.

The Council said that Doherty could get money from other sources to start a business.

A three-prong proposal came from three groups—represented by Megan Timm— who have combined their resources into one summer camp organization: Nome Community Center, Nome Eskimo Community and Norton Sound Health Corp. CAMP Dept.

The three organizations combined last year to serve more youth. NCC focus has been educating youth in order to reduce tobacco use; NEC, local culture; NSHC, healthy choices.

The group asked for $17,000 to expand the number of camps and the number of youth served. They tentatively planned for a Bear Creek site near Council.

Last year's program put on three camps attended by 45 youth.

Keith Conger, Nome Ski and Biathlon Team coach, wants new long skis for his 2014 team.

The team has been raising funds with selling Nanook Joe coffee and doing cleanup jobs.

Their biggest fundraiser is cleaning up the snow dump for the City of Nome

Last year the junior high girls' squad captured the 2013 Western Region Ski and Biathlon Championship Team Trophy. Team members Rosa Schmidt and Sam Dougherty have captured individual performance marks. The team is asking for money to replenish skis and equipment.

"A contribution of $5,000 would outfit a good number of junior high skiers, Conger told the Council.

Governor budget cuts $1 billion and 150 state jobs

By Diana Haecker

Governor Parnell released his budget for Fiscal Year 2015 last month, with a projection of a $1.1 billion deficit for FY 2015. The FY 2014 deficit is projected to reach $1.95 billion.

Parnell's FY '14 and '15 budgets is projected to spend $3 billion of Alaska's savings in just two years, representing over half of the $5 billion Statutory Budgetary Reserve.

Since the controversial SB 21 "More Alaska Production Act" did not go into effect until January 1, these deficits are not including what may come as loss to state revenues due to tax incentives that were meant to spur more oil exploration and development.

The Governor's budget totals $5.6 billion in state general funds and $12.4 billion including federal and other funds.

These include for Nome and the Bering Strait region the following items:

The Governor budgeted $150,000 for Anvil Mountain Correctional Center, deferred maintenance and $726,354 for deferred maintenance on the Nome Youth Facility. There are $500,000 budgeted for DNR to pursue the Seward Peninsula and Port Clarence port project development.

St. Michael was penciled in with $825,000 in federal funds for snow removal equipment building upgrades Shishmaref was budgeted with $560,000 in federal funds for airport resurfacing.

The Alaska Industrial Development and Export Authority got $8.5 million to pursue a private industrial road to the Ambler Mining District. Kotzebue received $2.5 million for the Swan Lake small boat harbor.

Statewide, the governor proposed $10 million for a Chinook research initiative under the roof of ADF&G.

A few large dollar items are notable: The governor allocated $2.165 million for office space renovations to accommodate the State Pipeline Coordinator's office.

Also, a project that has not advanced over the years, the Knik Arm Bridge and Toll Authority will get under the governor's budget $5 million in general funds and $50 million in federal funds. The project would build a bridge from Anchorage across the Knik River and connect Point MacKenzie to Anchorage.

The Susitna-Watana Hydroelectric Project, which was expected to gobble up more than $5 billion, already received roughly $95 million last year and $77 million in prior years. However, the Governor who favors the project, has only recommended funding it with $10 million for the project in the 2015 proposed capital budget. To get the project to the stage of federal license application, AIDEA needs $110 million.

The Legislature will convene on January 21 and will propose the House and Senate's budget versions.

Schools presented a wish list totaling almost $66,000 for improving every aspect of school life, he told the Council

Kendra Nichols, NSHC safety services director, asked for $4,450 to assist the annual injury-prevention safety fair. Last year the event had 18 tables, up from 6 tables in 2012 and growing. Last year featured a bike rodeo and provided 139 bike helmets. NRA did a gun safety module; USCG provided boating life vests; and various programs provided education on use of kiddie car seats, "no texting while driving;" child safety and safe sleep positions for babies. National Park Service also participated.

Nome Pre-School needed $5,000 to go directly to scholarships. The program serves three- and four-year olds. The school, the only one to take three-year-olds, can take more pupils that age and also more four-year-olds.

"The issue is tuition for a lot of families," Rebecca Callahan said. The enrollment currently comes to 38, but the school can serve 60. While enrollment was low last year, interest has increased, according to Callahan.

The amount could be even higher," Councilman Jerald Brown commented. "It is really a big benefit to the community."

Youth Education Services could use $3,200 for face-painting materials, music and other costs in putting on the seventh annual Summerfest in Anvil City Square. The event usually attracts 200 to 300 and features games, Bounce House, dunk tank, and all sorts of summer activities. The City's Parks and Recreation Dept. and Head Start also participate.

Cheri Kruschek would like to see $43,040 of the NSEDC money go into the City's Parks and Recreation budget to dress up Anvil City Square by rejuvenating the lawn and adding a sprinkler system. Over the years, the lawn has suffered settling of the ground and abuse of the area, she said. "I was hoping we could use some of the NSEDC money to get the lawn back to its green splendor," Kruschek's proposal said. Councilmembers said that project should go under the City budget, that taxpayers should bear the cost of some things.

Nome Rec Center needs $66,405 to renovate the kitchen, staff said. The kitchen was built in the 1980s. Renovation would allow the facility to promote itself as a convention and meetings destination with improvements providing a sit-down food service for up to 667 attending.

James Ventress made a pitch for Checkpoint Youth Center, a Covenant Church program centered in the former Arctic Trading Post store building on Front Street. The center sponsors an afterschool dropin program for youths in sixth grade through twelfth grade.

"The center, open from 5 p.m. to 9 p.m., is owned by the church. The budget is independent from the church, but is supported by the church," Ventress said.

The program has assistance including tutoring and counseling, ears to listen to youth concerns.

"It's a pretty diverse opportunity for the church to share the building with the community," Ventress said.

The wrestling mats at the high school were old when he got there in 1978, coach Dudley Homelvig told the Council. He would like to have $16,000 to replace them to prevent shoulder and head injuries. Council comments showed concern and foretold funding for the new mats to prevent City liability for injuries.

Sue Steinacher, executive director of the volunteer organization Nome Emergency Shelter Team (NEST) needed $20,000 to get a survey of housing and housing services not currently addressed in Nome.

"It is shocking to see the housing prices faced by people in Nome," Steinacher said, adding, "the time has come where we need a comprehensive housing assessment done."

Councilman Stan Andersen commented that he did not favor hiring someone to survey housing needs. Steinacher pointed out that such a survey is needed upon which to base grants proposals. Most of the money to run NEST last year came from grants, she said. The group runs a shelter for homeless in cold weather as well as homeless prevention and sober housing programs.

PAWS, a newly formed animal rescue group, needs $2,242 for equipment, according to Susan Wolf. The group wants to partner with the City of Nome and Nome Police Dept. in advocating for humane treatment of animals, she said, with programs for foster care, education, fundraising and spay-neuter clinics.

"We want to see our animal population protected and controlled at the same time," Wolf said.

Crystal Tobuk and Phyllis Walluk want to get the St. Lawrence Island dancers cranked up again. This would give Siberian Yupik youth a sense of purpose, they said, and help to preserve the diversity of the community. While she was still assessing involvement, Tobuk said 40 would be a sound number with participation from children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren as well as parents and elders. The group asked for $4,705. Too similar to the Nome Public Schools dance program, said the Council.

Robin Hughes presented a startup program called Fishing Nets, Kuvraq, in which youth would create and see their art projects applied to textiles and drinking mugs to sell. The group asked for $17,000. The program would reach out to youth ages 9-17 in villages as well as in Nome. Too much like ceramics class, said Councilman Matt Culley. Needed more planning, said the Council.

Anahma Shannon of Kawerak's recycling program was still looking for a forklift. Currently the operation is labor intensive with batteries and other heavy detritus having to be hoisted by hand. Lots of money and maybe the group could apply somewhere else for the money, Council said. Too many unused forklifts available.

Nome Public Schools put in a request for $65,978 to fund programs for students—breakfast snacks, cultural dance activities, intramural basketball and volleyball, swimming program, martial arts, Jr. ROTC and archery.

As it turned out, a list of award recipients materialized over the weekend to be adopted at the Monday, Jan. 13 Council meeting.

These are the groups and the amounts:

Nome Covenant Church Checkpoint Youth Center, $12,000; Nome Preschool Assn., $5,000; Youth Education Services (Summerfest), $3,200; Nome Wrestling Team (new mats), $16,000; NSHC Injury Prevention Program, $4,850; N.E.S.T., $10,000; Nome Ski and Biathlon 2014, $5,000; Nome Public Schools, $65,978; NCC, NEC and NSHC CAMP Dept., $10,000 to stage youth camps; Paws of Nome, $2,242.70 for constructing insulated dog houses, leashes chains, collars and leashes, for a total of $134,270.70. The Council voted the remaining $15,729.30 to a multiuse facility that will serve the youth hockey and other sports activities.

Bend in polar vortex brings Alaskan chill to Lower 48

By Diana Haecker

For three days, the world was upside down concerning "usual" weather patterns. Subzero temperatures wreaked havoc in the Lower 48 and Alaska, including Nome, saw warm temperatures hovering around the freezing point.

Between January 6 and 8, temperatures in Nome soared to 34°F. During the same time period, a severe cold snap affected a large swath from Montana to New York and as far south as Florida and northern Alabama.

What Western Alaska residents consider normal, caused much anxiety in the affected states. In the Midwest, wind chills reached -40°F and were considered life threatening. However, it is notable that no weather records were set during the cold spell.

Meanwhile, Nome and the region experienced higher than normal temperatures. National Weather Service meteorologist Robert Murders at the Nome weather station said 14°F is considered the normal average high temperature and -2°F as the normal average low temperature for this time of the year. January 6 observed 31°F as a high.

January 7 climbed to a high of 33°F and on January 8, the mercury showed a high of 34°F.

Since the beginning of the New Year, 3.9 inches of snow fell, where the normal for the month is 4 inches.

A warm spell in January accompanied by a snow dump is not unusual. But this warm period has been linked to a bend in the polar vortex, which caused a so-called Arctic outbreak in usually more temperate climate areas.

Dr. John Walsh, professor of Atmospheric Science at the University of Alaska at Fairbanks' International Arctic Research Center, explains the connection. "The polar vortex refers to a band of winds from the West to East, but what is unusual was the extreme bend in the polar vortex which transported cold air from the Arctic to the south," Dr. Walsh said.

Walsh said that the bend that transforms the polar vortex from a symmetrically oval jet stream over the Arctic to more a wavy pattern is

Kawerak Wellness: Parental Resilience

An informational article submitted by Kawerak Wellness, and republished with the permission of the Center for the Study of Social Policy

Being a parent can be a very rewarding and joyful experience. But being a parent can also have its share of stress. Parenting stress is caused by the pressures (stressors) that are placed on parents personally and in relation to their child:

- typical events and life changes (e.g., moving to a new city or not being able to soothe a crying baby)
- unexpected events (e.g., losing a job or discovering your child has a medical problem)
- individual factors (e.g., substance abuse or past traumatic experiences) social factors (e.g., relationship
- problems or feelings of loneliness and isolation)
   community, societal or environ-

• community, societal or environmental conditions (e.g., persistent poverty, racism or a natural disaster).

Numerous researchers have concluded that how parents respond to stressors is much more important than the stressor itself in determining the outcomes for themselves and their children. Parents are more likely to achieve healthy, favorable outcomes if they are resilient. Resilience is the process of managing stress and functioning well even when faced with challenges, adversity and trauma.

Some stressors parents face can be managed easily so that problems get resolved; for example, calling a relative or friend to pick-up a child from school when a parent is delayed. But some stressors cannot be easily resolved. For example, parents cannot "fix" their child's developmental disability or erase the abuse they suffered as a child. Rather, parents are resilient when they are able to call forth their inner strength to proactively meet personal challenges

When parents show resilience, they are able to see evidence of both their ability to face challenges and to make wise choices about addressing challenges. Parental resilience has a positive effect on the parent, the child and the parent-child relationship. By managing stressors, parents feel better and can provide more nurturing attention to their child, which enables their child to form a secure emotional attachment. Receiving nurturing attention and developing a secure emotional attachment with parents, in turn, fosters the development of resilience in children when they experience stress in their lives.

Sometimes the pressures parents face are so overwhelming that their ability to manage stress is severely affected. This is the case with parents who grew up in environments with toxic stress without a supportive adult. As a result, these parents may display symptoms of depression, anxiety, or other clinical disorders that prevent their ability to respond consistently, warmly and sensitively to their child's needs. For example, depressive symptoms in either mothers or fathers are found to disrupt healthy parenting practices so that the child of a depressed parent is at increased risk of poor attachments, maltreatment and poor physical, neurological, social-emotional, behavioral and cognitive outcomes. However, numerous research studies show parents can be helped to manage clinical symptoms and reactions to their own histories of poor attachments and trauma, to protect children from adversity and trauma as best they can and to provide more nurturing care that promotes secure emotional attachment and healthy development in their children.

All parents experience stress from time-to-time. Parental resilience is a process that all parents need in order effectively manage stressful situations and help ensure they and their families are on a trajectory of healthy, positive outcomes.

Bernice Joseph lost battle with cancer

Bernice Joseph, 49, the University of Alaska Fairbanks' Vice Chancellor for Rural, Community and Native Education died on Tuesday, January 7 from cancer.

Joseph is known as a tireless advocate for Native education in Alaska.

In 2013 she was diagnosed with pancreatic cancer.

Joseph was born in Tanana and raised in Nulato.

Most recently, Bernice Joseph was the executive dean of the College of Rural and Community Development in November 2001. As such she oversaw the six rural and community campuses, serving more than 160 primarily Native communities, including Northwest Campus in Nome. She was named vice chancellor for Rural, Community and Native Education in 2006. She served at UAF from 1995 - 2000 as an assistant professor in the Department of Alaska Native and Rural Develop-

She earned a master of business administration degree from UAF.

Before serving at UAF, Joseph was the deputy commissioner of the Alaska Department of Community and Economic Development. She was the department's tribal liaison, oversaw rural development programs, served as a member of the management team and was a key advisor to Gov. Tony Knowles. Joseph had also worked for the Doyon Foundation and the Fairbanks Native Association.

In 2012 she was named Citizen of the Year by AFN.

In Fairbanks, mourners participated in a one-mile memorial walk on Wednesday, Jan. 8.

On Thursday, a celebration of life was held at Chief David Salmon Tribal Hall

In lieu of flowers, the family suggests memorial contributions be made to the Doyon Foundation, in Bernice Joseph's name.

MUSHING NEWS—Nome musher Rolland Trowbridge runs his team on Gold Hill on Sunday, January 12. Trowbridge is signed up for the Kuskokwim 300 sled dog race in Bethel. The K300 starts January 17 and leads mushers from Bethel to Aniak and back to Bethel.

Bethel

The start of the Kuskokwim 300 sled dog race is January 17. According to K300 Race Manager Zach Fansler 28 teams are signed up as of January 10, including nine-time K300 champion Jeff King. Also signed up is 2011 Iditarod champion John Baker of Kotzebue, his partner Katherine Keith of Kotzebue, Donald Towarak of Unalakleet, as well as Rolland Trowbridge of Nome. The K300 features a purse of $110,000 with the winner taking $22,000, making it the richest mid distance race on the dog mushing circuit.

Simultaneous to the K300, there will be two shorter races: the Bogus Creek 150 covering a 150-mile course and the Akiak Dash, a 50-mile

After a warm start to the New Year, temperatures have cooled with a promising long-term weather forecast for race weekend. Fansler said that local crews on snowmachines have been monitoring the Kuskowkim River, which has several spots of thin ice as well as open holes. The ice roads from Bethel to Kwethluk as well as from Bethel to Akiakchak are in. A road grader was scheduled to put in the ice road from Kalskag to Akiak. Parts of the K300 race trail follow these ice roads.

When should men have their PSA levels checked?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Prostate cancer is the second leading cause of cancer-related deaths in men in the United States, second only to lung cancer. According to the American Cancer Society one in every six men will be diagnosed with prostate cancer at some point during his lifetime.

Since the 1990s, a screening test has been available to catch early cases of prostate cancer. But the test itself has become a source of confusion controversy.

The test measures levels of prostate specific ... antigen (PSA) in the blood stream.

PSA is a protein produced by both normal and cancerous cells in the prostate. Rapidly growing cancer cells produce a higher level of PSA than do normal cells.

A low level of PSA is always present in the bloodstream. Most doctors consider a level above 4 ng/mL to be abnormally elevated; however, a growing number of urologists and cancer specialists have suggested a level above 2.5 ng/mL could be abnormal.

A higher level of PSA in the bloodstream may indicate the presence of cancer in the prostate. I emphasize the word "may" because there are many things other than cancer that make the PSA level rise including infections of the prostate or bladder, enlargement of the prostate called benign prostatic hypertrophy, and direct pressure on the prostate from riding a bicycle, 4wheeler, or snowmachine.

The only way to know if a man with an elevated PSA has cancer is to perform a biopsy of the prostate, the walnut-sized gland that surrounds the urinary tract at the base of a man's bladder. This is a delicate procedure performed by urologists. Studies of biopsy results show that men with prostate cancer will have a higher PSA compared with men without prostate cancer only 67 percent of the time. This means the PSA is 67 percent accurate at predicting whether a man has prostate cancer or not. While this is a little better than the 50 percent predictability of flipping a coin it is far from perfect.

Some experts, including the American College of Preventive Medicine (ACPM), question whether the PSA should be used as a screening test at all. Though this may sound absurd, the ACPM recognizes that most men with prostate cancer will not die from their prostate cancer. In fact, autopsy research shows that if men live long enough most of them will eventually develop some degree of prostate cancer, though the cancer will remain confined to the prostate. Most men with prostate cancer will die from some other cause.

One large trial showed that 1,410 men would have to be screened and 48 additional cancers would have to be detected to prevent one death from prostate cancer. In essence this means 47 men must be over-treated to prevent one death.

No one would argue with the value of a life saved. But PSA screening leads to an increased number of procedures including biopsies and prostate surgeries surgeries that have risks that threaten a man's quality of life. OCTOR The most remarks associated with prostate procedures are impotence incontinence.

Researchers are working on ways to improve the PSA test to more effectively identify aggressive prostate cancers, and thereby save lives, without subjecting the mass of men to testing that may be falsely reassuring or unnecessarily worrisome.

For now, when it comes to prostate cancer screening, the PSA test is the best test doctors have to offer. Professional organizations vary widely in their recommendations for PSA screening. The final decision is best left to each patient and his provider after a discussion of risks and benefits of the test.

In general, the following recommendations from various groups provide some guidance based on the best data available:

The National Comprehensive Cancer Center (NCCN) Guidelines on the Early Detection of Prostate Cancer recommend an initial PSA test at age 50 for most men and age 40 for men at increased risk, such as African Americans or men with a family history of prostate cancer, to determine a baseline level. Any PSA result over 2.5 ng/mL should be evaluated further for risk of prostate cancer. PSA screening at regular intervals may be used to detect an upward trend in the PSA level, called PSA velocity.

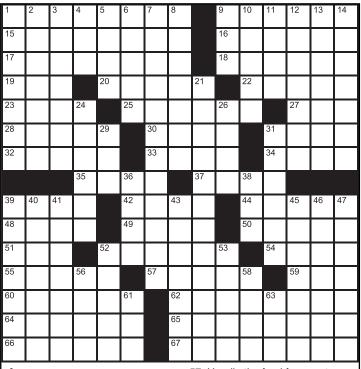

The American Urological Association recommends offering PSA screening beginning at age 50 in men with at least a 10-year life expectancy. African-American men and those with a first-degree relative with prostate cancer should consider screening at an earlier age.

A study published in the British Medical Journal suggested that men with a single PSA level of less than 1 ng/mL at age 60 do not require further screening because the lifetime risk of developing prostate cancer was only 0.2% for this group.

The American College of Preventive Medicine (ACPM) recommends discontinuing PSA screening in the asymptomatic male after age 75.

The American Academy of Family Physicians recommends that patients speak with a trusted provider about symptoms of prostate disease, like urinary urgency, frequency, or erectile dysfunction and whether or not PSA screening is indicated as a part of an overall health assessment.

Teresa Agnes Waters "Ugyaggi" "Tree" February 21, 1940 – December 25, 2013

Teresa Agnes Norbert was born on February 21, 1940 to John and Marion Norbert in Nome. Teresa was baptized at the St. Joseph Church in Nome on March 10, 1940. Teresa attended school in Nome and was also a member of the Girl Scouts.

In May of 1957 she married Allan Lewis Johnson and was divorced in February of 1971. During their marriage they raised six children—three sons and three daughters. In April of 1971, Teresa married John Charles Waters. During their marriage they raised one son, and divorced in 1976.

Teresa worked for and retired from the University of Alaska Fairbanks, in the Cooperative Extension Service in Nome.

Throughout her life, Teresa enjoyed spending time doing various activities with family members and

Saying it Sincerely

This scripture is often a favorite. An elder I admired had it highlighted in her Bible and underlined the word, "all", writing on the side "that means AII"

The scripture captures a truth about the process of healing. We need to share our burdens in order to be transformed. As human beings we want to deceive ourselves and hide our flaws. But it is in casting our anxieties – letting the Lord know our worries — that we experience the beginning steps toward acceptance and healing. In sharing our own story we find we are not alone and we find support in others. "Casting our anxieties upon the Lord" can often mean sharing our story and burdens with another human being whom God has put upon your path. It is a poignant yet simple truth that as we share our struggles we often find the support we need. Ironically, in sharing our flaws we also end up helping other people face their own anxieties. Here is an example of just that and how God worked through someone who "cast her cares upon the Lord."

Not many years ago it was taboo to mention alcoholism as something that your family struggled with let alone yourself. Betty Ford, the wife of President Gerald Ford, was one of the people in the limelight who blazed a trail for others. Over the years she became an alcoholic and addicted to prescription drugs. Her husband took her to doctors but no one had the guts to call her on it. Finally he and his family lovingly confronted her and helped her face the truth about herself. Though she fought it, she went to a treatment center and slowly began her recovery as she shared her pain with others. Eventually she shared her story publicly and helped millions in doing so. Her husband Gerald Ford told her that one day she would find that by sharing her own struggle with alcohol she would change the lives of people more than he ever did as president. Years later in October 1987, President Clinton said this as he awarded her with a congressional medal of honor:

"Perhaps no First Lady in our history, with the possible exception of Eleanor Roosevelt, has touched so many of us in a personal way. Because I lost my mother to breast cancer, Betty Ford is a heroine to me. Because my family has been victimized by alcoholism and I know what it is like to see good fine people stare into the abyss of their personal despair, I will be forever grateful — for the Betty Ford Clinic and any treatment center. I am thankful for the millions of other people whose lives have literally been turned around and often saved because she showed them it was not wrong for a good person and a strong person to be imperfect and ask for help. You gave us a gift and we thank you."

friends. She loved camping, spending many summer months at Nook. Those months were spent subsistence fishing, picking berries and various greens. Teresa also enjoyed sharing those Eskimo delicacies with her family and friends, during those lunches, dinners or picnics Teresa would say "life is good," after finishing those meals with family or friends with a cup of tea. Teresa was also a survivor of breast cancer in the 1980s.

Teresa enjoyed games like Scrabble, Yahtzee, Snertz, crossword puzzles and an occasional game of Monopoly. She also enjoyed sewing items like Kuspuks, neck and hand warmers for hunters, native wall art, paper towel and grocery bag holders.

"She always welcomed us with open arms, always gave rides and offered to feed us. Anchorage will not be the same without her," Marion "Sput" Norbert.

Teresa was preceded in death by her parents John Norbert, Sr. and Marion Menadelook; her sisters, Teresa Norbert and Rose Johnson, brothers Pat Norbert, Joseph Norbert, Rick Norbert and John Norbert, Jr., and grandchild Samantha Johnson

Teresa will be remembered for her compassion of others, love of life and for her quick witted humor.

Arrangements were under the direction of the Anchorage Funeral Home and Crematory, folks are invited to visit an online Guest Book for Teresa"Tree" Waters at www.AlaskanFuneral.com. In lieu of flowers, donations can be made to a Wells Fargo Account# 7511757192.

Volunteers work hard to repeal the Oil Giveaway

This holiday season I have been incredibly grateful for all the Alaskans who are working to defend our resource wealth. In the 60 years since I worked alongside many great

Thank you to the hundreds of volunteers who gathered petitions to put

NEW REPORT: Congressman Young's non-existent 2014 agenda hurts middle class families

According to a New York Times Jan. 5, Congressman Don Young's "do nothing' Congress is preparing to do even less.

The paper revealed that Congressman Young's Republican leaders have an even more pathetic agenda in store for 2014 than in 2013, whenthey hurt middle class families by obsessively focusing on repealing the Affordable Care Act and refusing to pass measures that would help create jobs, increase wages and strengthen the middle class.

According to the report: "Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, the House majority leader, is quietly playing down expectations for any major legislative achievements in the final year of the 113th Congress, which passed fewer laws in its first year -65— than any single session on record. The calendar, drawn up to maximize campaign time ahead of midterm elections in November, is bare bones, with the House in session just 97 days before Election Day, the last on Oct. 2, and 112 days in all."

'Congressman Young spent last year standing in the way of reasonable solutions, protecting insurance companies and tax breaks for billionaires and big oil – and today's report reveals that Congressman Young plans more of the same this year, while middle class families continue to struggle," said Emily Bittner of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Alaska's middle class families are getting squeezed more and more every day, with earnings stagnating and millions of Americans still looking for work, but Congressman Young's non-existent agenda will only continue to show that they would rather side with their big contributors and special interests than work for the middle class.'

BACKGROUND:

New York Times: "Do Nothing' Congress is Preparing to Do Even "Representative Eric Cantor of Virginia, the House majority leader, is quietly playing down expectations for any major legislative achievements in the final year of the 113th Congress, which passed fewer laws in its first year -65 — than any single session on record. The calendar, drawn up to maximize campaign time ahead of midterm elections in November, is bare bones, with the House in session just 97 days before Election Day, the last on Oct. 2, and 112 days in all. [...] Expectations for the session are so low that lawmakers say early action on White House priorities like raising the minimum wage, restoring unemployment benefits that expired and overhauling immigration laws are likely to go nowhere." The stakes could not be higher. Less than a year after passage of the SB 21, the Oil Tax Giveaway, Alaska ran up a $1 billion deficit. Just last month, the Governor acknowledged that Alaska will lose $2 billion in oil revenue in Fiscal Year 2014, a stunning 1/3 of the state's total oil revenue. The news just keeps getting worse: When he released his budget, Governor Parnell admitted there is a $3 billion deficit over the next 18 months. These kinds of budget deficits are unsustainable, and we will only get back to balanced budgets by repealing the Remember, not too long ago we were running up large budget surpluses. In 2007, a bipartisan group of legislators passed "Alaska's Clear and Equitable Share," an oil tax system designed to get a fair share for Alaskans. This system, known as "ACES," had a progressive tax structure, so that when oil prices went up Alaskans also earned more oil revenue. As a result, Alaskans saved $17 billion between 2007 and 2013, wiping out an older deficit. We didn't just save money for the future: ACES revenue helped us weather the 2008 recession by investing in capital infrastructure projects that kept Alaskan laborers, carpenters, ironworkers, engineers, and other workers on the job.

Unfortunately SB 21 swept ACES out the door and started a new era of massive budget deficits. Of course, the Oil Giveaway is wildly unpopular. It only passed the legislature after the Governor gerrymandered the state senate and elim-

After the Oil Giveaway passed we worked with hundreds of volunteers across Alaska to begin repealing it. Pundits predicted that it would be impossible to collect the required 30,000 signatures in 90 days. But within 75 days, 50,000 Alaskans from every corner of the state signed petitions to have a referendum on repealing the Oil Giveaway. As a result, during the primary election in August 2014, Alaskans will be able to vote "YES" on Proposition One and defend the Owner State.

I have been privileged to be part of this effort that seeks to preserve our rights under Alaska's Constitution. It follows the spirit of great Alaskans who fought for our resources. Bill Egan, Bob Bartlett, Jay Hammond, Wally Hickel, and others. We have joined them in defense of what Hickel defined as the "Owner State" and insisting that "It's Our Oil"

Over the holidays, I reflected on how the future of our state is in good hands. Not in Parnell's hands, not the lobbyists' who pull strings in Juneau. But your hands, in the hands of Alaska voters!

So thank you for standing up for Alaska values against those who would sell us out to Outside interests. Thank you for defending the Alaska that we all know and love.

SKI TEAM( top) — Flying snow didn't keep the Nome Ski and Biathlon team from practicing on Wednesday, Jan. 8. While Nome experienced warmer than normal temperatures, Lower 48 states got a taste of the arctic chill for several days beginning January 6.

SATELLITE VIEW (right) — This image of Earth on 6 January shows the persistent flow of arctic air from northern Alaska and Yukon into North America.

Bend in polar vortex

Dr. Jim Overland with NOAA's Pacific Marine Environmental Laboratory concurred and explained that in the last five years, the jet stream has taken on more of a wavy shape. "This waviness is leading to colder weather down in the eastern U.S. and eastern Asia. Whether this is normal randomness or related to the significant climate changes occurring in the Arctic is not entirely clear, especially when considering individual events, but less sea ice and snow cover in the Arctic and relatively warmer Arctic air temperatures at the end of autumn suggest a more wavy pattern to the jet stream and more variability between the straight and wavy pattern," wrote Overland on the NOAA website

"Predicting polar vortex bends is beyond our capabilities,"

- Dr. John Walsh

Dr. Walsh said that a multitude of factors are at play, including ocean temperatures and more open water in the Arctic. "But predicting those polar vortex bends is beyond our capabilities," Dr. Walsh said.

However there is an Arctic connection. For the last five to 10 years, Walsh said, there is less sea ice in the Arctic in the summer. When new ice forms, at a later time in the year, the ice is thinner and less stable. Ice formed later this year in the Arctic, and in the absence of ice, more open water in the Chukchi Sea could be a factor to tilt the bend. Open water heats the atmosphere, which in turn changes barometric pressure and wind dynamics. This can lead to a change in the direction of the jet stream transporting cold air and winds to the south.

Dr. Walsh pointed to occurrences of extreme cold outbreaks in 1976/77 and 1983.

The connection between the Arctic warming trend and more severe weather in the mid-latitudes is an active area of research.

Altogether, Dr. Walsh didn't find it shocking that another Arctic outbreak happened in the Lower 48. "I don't think it is that surprising," he said. "We were overdue for something like this."

In December, the NWS in Nome measured a monthly temperature average of 14.3°F, which is 4.7°F warmer than the normal average, said meteorologist Robert Murders. The highest temperature was 37°F on December 7, with the lowest temp being -20°F on Dec. 29.

The accumulated snowfall for December was 18.4 inches. On Dec. 20, it snowed 6.5 inches. "That was the most we had in 24 hour period for December," said Murders.

He added that including the rain that fell in the early part of December, Nome showed 2.01 inches of precipitation, which is 0.93 inches above normal.

Nome's weather station contributes its share for forecasting weather by being part of a worldwide network of weather stations that send weather balloons aloft every day. The balloons are vehicles that transport a variety of instruments into the atmosphere that measure temperature, humidity and position and transmit the data to the weather station. This occurs everywhere at the same time, in Nome, the data starts coming in around 3 p.m. and every night at 3 a.m.

Murders said that data is different from day to day. "Sometimes they only go 10 miles in a day, but last week, within one hour and half, the balloon was 127 miles away," said Murders. The balloons could go 100,000 feet up in atmosphere, but the weather experts are concerned with data below 40,000 feet, roughly the altitude of the jet stream.

All the data collected Alaska and nationwide goes into database at the National Center for Environmental Prediction, Murders said. The data is used to produce a variety of models to predict weather forecasts.

Murders explained also that every NWS location reports the barometric pressure at sea level. While predicting local weather is complicated enough, predicting variations of the circumpolar vortex is nearly impossible.

"There are so many different things that affect the jet stream," said Murders. "That's one of the difficulties for forecasting the weather every day, let alone predicting a bend in the polar vortex."

CURRENT STATE— The State Office Building in Nome shows signs of old age and will get a facelift this year.

• State building

The schematic design shows an additional space on top of the roof, which will house the entire mechanical system, which is currently in the crawlspace under the building. "There will be completely new wiring, new data communication cables and a new fire alarm system," explained Mintz.

Inside, all walls will come down and all offices will see a new layout. State buildings across the entire state are now supposed to have "universal space standards." This means that state offices across the Great Land are to look the same, have the same furniture and the same floor plan design. The space standards favor open offices with individual cubicles to make more efficient use of space, explained Mintz. It also allows natural light to flood through the open office space. For higher positions and offices that require confidentiality such as the district attorney's office and OCS, the public will be kept up front and away from the workstations of the employees.

In order to keep workstations clean and uncluttered, the state doesn't allow individuals to bring in their own small refrigerators, coffee makers or other appliances. Instead, there will be one 330 square foot break room for all employees. Also, there will be two conference rooms to be shared by all departments and a phone room for employees to hold private conversations.

The ADF&G lab and freezer will remain in their current location.

The west entrance, which is now the entrance to ADF&G will be employee only and the public will enter through the main entrance, where the Legislative Information Office is.

Mintz said the bid due date was extended to February 11, at 2:00 p.m., with the contract to be awarded aroundMarch 1.

Work is supposed to begin this summer once materials can be barged in.

The building currently houses Legislative offices, Dept. of Law, Office of Children Services, Dept. of Corrections, Dept. of Fish and Game and the Dept. of Health and Human Services. The Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development is located in the Bering Straits Native Corporation building. The Division of Elections and the Dept. of Motor Vehicle registration are at the Sitnasuak building, but will be moved to the new state building once it's renovated.

The Alaska State Troopers found a home at the National Guard Armory last year, where they will stay.

The renovation's completion date is March 31, 2015.

Coast Guard to increase presence this summer

By Diana Haecker

Coast Guard Rear Admiral Thomas Ostebo paid Nome a visit on Thursday, January 16 and updated the public on the Coast Guard activities in the region this summer. He said the amount of marine traffic through the Bering Strait is growing every year. Last year saw the biggest number of ships and tons of cargo making its way through the Bering Strait. The year 2013 saw 440

Bering Strait transits with 240 vessels in the Coast Guard 17th District Arctic area of concern. In 2012 there were 480 Bering Strait transits with 250 vessels in the American Arctic. That year, Shell embarked on its first exploratory mission in the Beaufort Sea and the Chukchi Sea.

Shell plans to continue its exploration efforts in the Chukchi Sea this summer.

"The biggest threat, I think, is not the drilling but the increase in marine traffic," Ostebo said.

The Bering Strait, Ostebo pointed out, is an international strait and the waters are not owned or regulated by the USA or Russia. It is an international strait, but currently has no traffic rules in particular.

The Coast Guard has undertaken a Port Access Route Study that would outline recommended traffic lanes through the Bering Sea, through the Bering Strait and on to the Arctic. But right now, Ostebo said, there are no traffic lanes, there are no stoplights. "When you look at other straits, there are clear traffic rules," he said.

The PARS study aims to make recommendations by delineating the best shipping route to and from the Arctic. The Coast Guard Commandant is making the pitch to the International Maritime Organization for a formal vessel traffic separation scheme, which would have to be voted on by all countries represented in the IMO. The IMO is the United Nations specialized agency responsible for the safety and security of shipping and the prevention of marine pollution by ships.

But until the wheels of the IMO are turning, the Coast Guard also moves forward developing a voluntary scheme that involves insurance companies and shipping companies

Council: Good-bye fake weed, hello animal control

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council is taking steps to make Nome a better place to live for people and animals and to back up the laws supporting the benefits of living in the community.

Ordinances covering retooled animal control rules, a ban on fake marijuana, "spice" and other synthetic compounds, and an ordinance stiffening violations of City laws shared space on the workbench at a work session Jan. 20.

The drug law would make the sale—or transfer with or without money— of any synthetic cannabinoid a crime within Nome's city limits.

Synthetic cannabinoid?

That means any substance that is an ingredient of any substance that when consumed results in an altered conscious state or an effect similar to using marijuana.

This law would cover "spice" or similar substances under any brand name, or substance that the seller reasonably believes would be consumed that is marked "not for human consumption."

These harmful substances are difficult to regulate, according to Nome Police Chief John Papasodora, because when one is banned, the manufacturers make changes in the chemical makeup to skirt the drug law.

Even so, the proposed law is too broad, said Councilman Matt Culley, adding that all it takes is one "bad apple" cop to selectively run in someone for innocent substances as unlabeled teabags.

"We want to make it illegal for sale, possession and distribution," Papasodora said.

City attorney staff cautioned against making a law that would ating a winter storm warning in effect from Monday until Tuesday 6 p.m.

The forecast predicted blizzard conditions, high winds and warm temperatures.

This system came at the heels of a storm that swept through the region on Thursday and Friday with wind gusts to 61 mph and wind speeds of 58 mph bearing down on the region.

While temperatures were still cold on Thursday, Jan. 16 at 1°F, the barometric pressure fell rapidly, warming the area up to 30°F by Friday, Jan. 17. Thursday saw wind speeds up to 31 mph and gusts to 38 mph and although no snow fell, the wind picked up snow on the ground and swirled it around.

On Friday around noon, the winds started howling in earnest, sending anything not nailed down or frozen-in flying into the air. In addition to high winds, about 3.5 inches of snow fell.

When conditions began to deteriorate, most of Nome shut down.

I understand the reasons some senators and congressmen support HB77 and its corresponding Senate bill. I would however like to change their minds. I get that industry and perhaps some of the people in state government see our current permitting system as, complex, sometimes confused, perhaps at times overbearing and above all slow. I realize that many state employees and business leaders would like to see quicker more wide spread resource development throughout the state. This is seen as providing more jobs and more revenue for the state, which is seeing declines in tax revenue and jobs in the oil industry.

I totally get all of that.

I also feel that there are many citizens of this state, who do not understand the permitting process, may not care about it, but do care about the natural resources that they use each year, (may take them for granted but will sure bitch like hell if

But there are some assumptions being made by you politicians that are supporting this HB77 bill that I have concerns with. One of them is that we can trust big corporations (mining conglomerates, oil companies, timber industry) to do the right, the responsible, the long-term environmentally sound resource development thing.

The mining industry, in particular has a long, dark record in the U.S. Large open pit, strip and mountain top removal types of mineral extraction have a long and somewhat jaded history in the United States as well as other countries.

Unfortunately when you are talking about large low-grade ore bodies, this is the type of mining you will have. There are numerous superfund sites that "we the people" have been left to pay for out of our taxes.

This is what concerns me about the removal of public comment, notification, and open public process

Common Sense Finally someone has stepped up to the plate and put good, solid science to work. The Bristol Bay Region is the mother lode for the world's most productive sockeye salmon fishery. The salmon of Bristol Bay have been fattening Alaskan coffers with billions of bucks for generations. They are a highly prized commodity and, better yet, they renew themselves and they can be eaten. What a gift - a beautiful re-

Sure, we are hearing a great deal of political hoopla about the big, bad federal Environmental Protection Agency picking on the poor of Pebble Mine, that innocent group that is looking out for their own best interests. These are the folks who say their large-scale hard rock copper/gold mine would never leak into the Bristol Bay Fishery Reserve. Research shows that even a minute amount of copper leaking into the waters of the reserve would kill salmon. It is also known that Pebble would generate over 10 billion tons of hard rock mining waste. Are we to believe the Pebble folks when they say "Trust us, we won't spill." Can we take Pebble's word that no waste would ever get into the water supply? Hardly. Can we take that chance? We should never be so ignorant as to jeopardize the gift of a fishery that annually pours

We can be thankful that the EPA has concluded that the Pebble Mine would indeed put an end to the world's finest fishery and destroy the economy and cultures that depend on it. Let's not get caught up in all this "federal overreach" mantra. The EPA is saving our Alaskan that seems to be happening with HB77. The streamlining of the permitting process is being put into mainly one man's hands, (ADNR Commissioner). He is an unelected public servant appointed by the governor, and he more than anyone else will be deciding who gets these water and resource development rights and for how long. And this HB77 streamlining process will make it easy for this commissioner of Dept. of Natural Resources to give these water and resource development rights to the faceless large corporate mining interests.

There will be no guarantee of Alaskan jobs from these decisions. And after studying the reclamation laws that were written (some by the federal government themselves) regarding mountain top removal in the coal mining areas of Appalachia, there is no good basis to think that meeting a federal label of restoration

EPA releases Bristol Bay Assessment

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency last week released a Bristol Bay assessment describing potential impacts to salmon and ecological resources from the proposed large-scale copper and gold mining in Bristol Bay. The report concludes that large-scale mining in the Bristol Bay watershed poses risks to salmon and Alaska Native cultures. Bristol Bay supports the largest sockeye salmon fishery in the world, producing nearly 50 percent of the world's wild sockeye salmon with runs averaging 37.5 million fish each year.

"Over three years, EPA compiled the best, most current science on the Bristol Bay watershed to understand how large-scale mining could impact salmon and water in this unique area of unparalleled natural resources,' said Dennis McLerran, Regional Administrator for EPA Region 10. "Our report concludes that large-scale mining poses risks to salmon and the tribal communities that have depended on them for thousands of years. The assessment is a technical resource for governments, tribes and the public as we consider how to address the challenges of large-scale mining and ecological protection in the Bristol Bay watershed."

To assess potential mining impacts to salmon resources, EPA considered realistic mine scenarios based on a preliminary plan that was published by Northern Dynasty Minerals Ltd. and submitted to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. EPA also considered mining industry references and consulted mining experts. Numerous risks associated with large-scale mining are detailed in the assessment:

Depending on the size of the mine, EPA estimates 24 to 94 miles of salmon-supporting streams and 1,300 to 5,350 acres of wetlands, ponds, and lakes would be destroyed. EPA estimates an additional 9 to 33 miles of salmon-supporting streams would experience altered stream flows likely to affect ecosystem structure and function.

Extensive quantities of mine waste, leachates, and wastewater would have to be collected, stored, treated and managed during mining and long after mining concludes. Consistent with the recent record of similar mines operating in the United States, polluted water from the mine site could enter streams through uncollected leachate or runoff, in spite of modern mining practices. Under routine operations, EPA estimates adverse direct and indirect effects on fish in 13 to 51 miles of streams.

Risks due to failures and accidents include the potential failure of wastewater treatment facilities, which could affect fish in 48 to 62 miles of streams. Failure of a tailings storage facility dam that released only a partial volume of the stored tailings would result in catastrophic effects on fishery resources.

In 2010, several Bristol Bay Alaska Native tribes requested that EPA take action under the Clean Water Act to protect the Bristol Bay watershed and salmon resources from development of the proposed Pebble Mine, a copper, gold and molybdenum mining venture backed by Northern Dynasty Minerals Ltd.

Pebble Partnership CEO John Shively commented on the EPA assessment, saying the process had been rushed and resulted in two very flawed documents. Shively said the EPA did not take the time nor did it commit the financial resources to assess the potential impacts of development in an area the size of the state of Ohio. "It is both a poorly conceived and poorly executed study, and it cannot serve as the scientific basis for any decisions concerning Pebble," said Shively in a press re-

Shively said the Pebble Limited Partnership has spent many years and $600 million on engineering and environmental studies to develop a plan for a 21st century mine. "We understand the critical role salmon plays in this region of Alaska, both culturally and commercially. This is why we have dedicated significant time and resources to our environmental studies program and why we have taken time to design a responsible project for developing the mineral resource at Pebble," Shively

US Senator Mark Begich reacted to the EPA assessment saying that he's been a strong supporter of Alaska's mining industry, but that years of scientific study have proven the proposed Pebble Mine cannot be developed safely in the Bristol Bay watershed. As the multi-year watershed assessment details, the mine would likely threaten the largest and most lucrative salmon run in the world. "Bristol Bay produces half the world's red salmon and supports thousands of fishing jobs and way of life for thousands of Alaskans. Thousands of Alaskans have weighed in on this issue and I have listened to their concerns. Pebble is not worth the risk," Begich said. "I agree with other pro-development Alaska leaders such as Senator Ted Stevens and former governors Jay Hammond and Tony Knowles, that Pebble is the wrong mine in the wrong place for Alaska."

Gubernatorial candidate Byron Mallot also released a statement, saying that the Pebble mine is one mine too far. "Once the door to mining is opened in this sensitive area, it can never be closed again. The science confirms what the commercial fishing industry, sport fishers and the people of Bristol Bay have long believed: This mine would upset a delicate natural balance, threaten jobs and destroy a sacred way of life in Alaska."

USGS finds Arctic warming creates goose habitat

Scientists with the U.S. Geological Survey report that warming temperatures are leading to the creation of high quality habitats for geese along the Arctic coast of Alaska. This scientific finding is contrary to the effects that warming global temperatures are having on habitats of sea ice-dependent animals, such as polar bear and walrus.

The USGS research findings focus on black brant geese that migrate by the thousands each summer to the Arctic Coastal Plain of Alaska to undergo their wing molt, during which time the birds are flightless for three weeks. This molting period requires high quality food to give the birds the energy necessary to replace worn feathers and also extensive open water areas where birds can escape from predators.

Since the 1970s, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has noted a shift in the distribution of black brant geese near Teshekpuk Lake, a large lake south east of Barrow in the center of the Arctic Coastal Plain and within the National Petroleum Reserve. The most important change has been that geese are moving away from large inland lakes to coastal salt marshes.

"This was a case where we knew that geese were shifting their molting distribution from the long term survey data, but 'why' was the question," says Paul Flint, a research wildlife biologist with the USGS and one of the authors of the new research.

The answer, according to Dr. Flint, is that the shift of black brant from inland lakes to coastal areas is the result of creation of new habitat along the coast as opposed to degradation of inland habitat. As part of this work, new molting areas were discovered outside the historic range.

Results from the research suggest that black brant are dispersing from the Teshekpuk Lake area into new coastal habitats, while simultaneously redistributing within the Teshekpuk Lake area.

Surveys conducted in new coastal molting habitats documented a 50 percent increase in the population size of molting black brant along the Arctic Coast.

The authors also conclude that continued reductions in sea ice and associated permafrost melting may continue to alter coastal areas toward creating more salt marshes and thus facilitate further changes in goose distributions.

City reaches for lawbreakers with list of fines

By Sandra L. Medearis

The City wants to increase its ability to enforce municipal laws by issuing citations that are enforceable through the Alaska Court System, set new penalties for infractions that are not clearly defined, and update enforcement provisions in its code in order to comply with court requirements and new procedures such as Minor Offenses. Additionally, the City of Nome wants to define clearly the procedures for issuing and processing citations for certain specified violations.

City administration and Council

also want to fatten the bottom line with fines coming into City coffers. Thus, they must get into synch with state statutes. A new ordinance will repeal part of the Nome Code of Ordinances and re-enact a chapter to add sections establishing fines and a fine schedule for violation of City ordinances and authorize enforcement through citations and procedures for disposing of citations.

The City has put forth a document of 22 pages that proposes to amend, augment or replace codes dealing with violations and infractions of its laws.

The State of Alaska Court System has established new procedural rules governing such infractions known as Minor Offenses. The procedure applies to over 40 offenses. One may dispose of citations for these offenses without a court appearance, upon payment of fines and a state surcharge required by statutes. If a person charged with one of these offenses appears in court and is found guilty, the penalty imposed for the offense cannot exceed the fine listed for the offense in the state law and may not be judicially reduced.

Furthermore, the new ordinance would allow the City to enforce violations of municipal ordinances as infractions, which are non-criminal offenses, may not result in prison, criminal punishment or loss of a valuable license subject to certain conditions.

The Council, administration and the City's attorneys were trying to comb through City laws to see which items conflict with state law. The City's administration hoped to get a version ready for first reading at the Council's regular meeting scheduled for Jan. 27.

Some of the offenses covered by the Court's Minor Offense procedures that are of interest locally are: transient merchant unlawfully entering a residence, $100; selling pulltabs without the required license, $25 per day; buying or selling non-municipal electricity, $100; operating a motor-driven vehicle under the age of 14, or operating a snowmachine or ATV without a license, operating an ATV or snow machine under age 16 without adult supervision; inadequate lighting of such machine or failure to stop at direction of a peace officer, all $100-fines; operating a bicycle on a sidewalk, $100; and violation of smoking laws regarding forbidden areas, posting of fines, removing ashtrays in non-smoking areas, fines of $100 first offense, $200 second offense and $500 for third and subsequent offenses.

Other offenses under the Minor Offenses law are prohibited land transactions, conveying land without a proper plat or filing an unapproved plat, $100; possessing, exploding or selling fireworks within Nome City limits, without permits, $100; and failure to remove snow from an adjoining sidewalk; $100.

Curfew violations will cause the minor, parent and owner, operator or employee knowingly allowing curfew violation the following fines: $50, first offense; $75 the second of-tract a lawsuit from the American Civil Liberties Union. Charles Cacciola and Patrick Munson, the City's attorneys attended by telephone

"If a person challenges in court, the court would say the ordinance was overly broad," said Charles Cacciola, attorney.

"You can't make a law you know is faulty," said Culley.

So what? said Councilman Stan Andersen—round up as many violators of the law as possible before it is struck down.

"This is a small town and you can boil it down to 40 people," Andersen said. "If they know what it does and they sell it, it makes me suspicious of them for all time. I wonder what else they are doing to for a buck."

A local store has sold such substance, according to Nome Police Chief John Papasodora, but has now taken the stuff off its shelves. The substances also come into Nome through the mail.

Such substance has a variety of street names, for example: K2, Spice, Black Mamba, Bombay Blue, Fake Weed, Genie, Zohai, Bliss, Blaze, JWH-018, -073, -250, Yukatan Fire, Skunk and Moon Rocks

The substances "are a significant safety risk, not only to the users, but those around them," Papasodora told the Council. "They can cause permanent psychosis."

Papasodora recounted a recent incident when police contacted an individual who believed he had six arms and six legs.

The substances can cause physical effects also, like increased heart rate, high blood pressure, heart attack or death, according to the Chief.

City staff will continue to work with the attorneys to come up with the final version of the law.

Anchorage passed a similar ordinance this month.

Curb your dog

Next, the session tackled an animal control ordinance which would repeal the current law and replace it with measures addressing control and animal care—for example, licensing, impounding, adoption of unclaimed, abandoned or surrendered animals, vaccinations, biting dogs-rabies control, and on the other hand, sanitary enclosures and sanitary exercise, humane animal care, cruelty to animals, protective custody, dog teams and trapping with such mechanisms as steel jay traps, snares and spring traps within 50 feet of residences and in certain areas within city limits.

The law, if adopted, will be backed up with fines and fees. Civil fees as impound fees to cover room and board may be appealed to the city manager. Fines can be appealed to the Alaska Superior Court and then on up to the Alaska Supreme Court.

Some parts of the ordinance pertain, like licensing, to dogs, cats and horses. Other parts, such as the ban on cruelty to animals, apply to all animals.

The ordinance in the form presented Jan. 15 empowers enforcement officers to enter onto private property on which an animal is located and to require the owner of any animal to provide proof of license and vaccinations upon probable cause.

Upon proof of licensing, an owner may gain release of an animal by paying the following fees: $50 for the first impounding, $75 for the second impounding and $100 for the third and subsequent impounding. At the end of 24 months, the clock starts again with $50.

Additionally, an owner would pay $30 a day kenneling fee, with a maximum of $300 for each 10-day period, including the day the animal is impounded and the day the animal is released.

An animal owner may surrender it to the City Animal Control Facility for adoption for a fee of $150, provided the animal is older than 10 weeks, owner has proof of current vaccinations, and owner provides an affidavit that the animal is not aggressive and has not harmed a person or other animal.

According to the section on humane animal care, providing such care includes but is not limited to providing wholesome and nutritious food once a day, providing sufficient quantities of fresh water that meet hydration requirements, and adequate shelter which provides adequate air and ventilation and keeps an animal from being exposed to bad weather or in unsanitary, uncomfortable and wet conditions that threaten the health of an animal.

Enclosures—structures, pens, yards and areas must be maintained in sanitary condition with regular removal and disposal of animal wastes.

The proposed law makes it a violation to exercise animals on property belonging to another without permission. Wastes must be removed to prevent pests and disease.

Cruelty to animals includes intentionally killing an animal unless done humanely or to defend a person or an animal from attack; intentionally or recklessly wounding, injurtormenting, poisoning, provoking or unnecessarily overworking an animal; throwing any poisonous substance on exposed public or private place where it may endanger an animal: intentionally harassing or encouraging an animal to fight another animal for sport, training or entertainment. The section applies to all domestic or wild animals.

According to the ordinance, animals will not be unattended, meaning running at large without a leash.

The ordinance allows exceptions for certified service animals or areas where no persons other than the owner and his party are present or the animal is under voice command at all times.

"Objectionable animals include animals that lunge and jump at people or make frequent or prolonged noise as a nuisance. Objectionable barking means 20 minutes straight within one hour during the hours 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. and for 10 minutes between the hours 10 p.m. and 7 a.m."

In summary, fines for unlicensed animal would be $50, $75 and $100 for first, second and third offences, and the same for unattended (loose) animals.

In other business, the Council worked on an ordinance to tighten up enforcement on violations of the City's laws.

Planning Commission discusses procedures

By Nancy McGuire

The Nome Planning Commission braved 50 mph winds and met in a work session Friday noon to discuss procedures for administering zoning violation decisions with the City administration.

At issue was a situation with a lot at 203 W E. Street owned by Susan Nowland.

Nowland was found in violation of the 5 ft. variance between her lot and the adjacent lot.

She built a utility shack without the proper set back and it extended a short distance onto the neighbor's lot. She did not follow proper procedure with the Planning Commission

She was told in a letter from the City Clerk to remove the structure by Jan. 1.

Nowland went to City Manager Josie Bahnke and asked for an extension. Bahnke gave her an extension till June and thus eliminating the $300/day fine Nowland would have to pay for being out of compliance

Planning Commission Chair Charlie Weiss reminded Nowland that they were not at the work session to hear her variance issues, but to clarify the administrative process.

An appeal was not given to the other landowner and with the advice of City Planner Eileen Bechtol, the city manager made an administrative decision and issued the extension because it would be too difficult to comply in January with the snow and ice complicating the removal.

Present were Charlie Weiss, Robert Cahoon, Ken Hughes, Nikolai Ivanoff, Sara Lizak and Larry Pederson, John Odden was absent.

announced early closings on Friday. The Nome Community Center, XYZ and fuel delivery companies Crowley and Bonanza also ceased operations

At one point, the Nome Police Department stopped patrolling and only responded to calls. They received 15 weather related calls over the weekend, mostly in regards to stuck vehicles. No injuries were reported. According to R J with R J's Automotive Repair, the snow accumulated faster than the snowplows could keep up. R J ended up pulling out five cars that were stuck in the snow at Sixth Avenue and Greg Kruschek Avenue near the hospital.

Eventually, RJ got stuck too and a City of Nome Public Works grader had to pull him out of the snow.

The City's road crew plowed roads until conditions deteriorated badly at 4 p.m. They went to "emergency-call-out mode" only. The resumed work again at 7 p.m. and plowed city roads until midnight. The crew worked all weekend to plow city streets.

The storm abated by Saturday when winds calmed down to 17 mph and temperatures remained warm with maximum high of 33 °F and a minimum of 23°F. The normal temperatures for this time of the year are 13°F for high temps and -3°F for the minimum temperature.

Increased traffic begs middle dock for Port causeway

By Sandra L. Medearis

A middle dock to increase the number of ships that can load and unload cargo on the Port of Nome causeway is critical to what is going on in Western Alaska, Sen. Donny Olson agrees.

But will he put a key $3million for partial funding at the top of his priorities list in spending his district's discretionary money from legislature? Maybe yes, maybe no. In speaking by phone at a Port Commission meeting Jan. 16, Olson sounded like he would support it strongly, but on the other hand, money was going to be very tight this legislative session, Olson said.

The City of Nome and Port Commission have been beating around for the money for some time. The Port of Nome is coming out well in the Arctic Port Study cost-benefit ratio and gaining support to serve as an Arctic port site for resource development, search and rescue remarine environment stewardship and a practical location for preserving U.S. sovereignty in the Arctic. The City and port administration have been pushing capital improvements for around eight years to be ready for selection as an Arctic deep-water port site.

Commissioner Jimmy West Jr. put it to Olson straight.

Regarding discretionary funds, he asked Olson, "Will you commit to $3 million? We need to proceed," West said, looking at the table where Olson's voice came out of the phone.

"My dad was in the barge business. I watched the jetty get too Olson started heading around Robin Hood's barn.

Charley Lean took up the pom-

"It is an $8 million project. We already have $5 million secured," Lean said. "If you look at how vessels are waiting to get in [to the existing two causeway docks], it is a real priority to the region.'

"We'll certainly put it up there [on priority list] and do our best," Olson said. "It's a big ask, but to handle traffic coming in from the ocean we'll do our utmost. From what I can see, it is going to be a very contentious session-especially contentious.

"In the last six years there was a budget surplus. Now there is a $2-billion deficit," Olson explained.

Olson was not finished. Governor Sean Parnell had committed to projects Olson thought "ill-conceived," and the Susitna Dam Project-"that had never penciled out"-to provide cheap energy for the Railbelt.

The City is looking for the $3million as a match for a $1million EDA grant application submitted in the Sept. 2013 funding cycle. The City has just under $5 million from State of Alaska government obligation bonds allocated to the project, plus $500,000 awarded by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.

Port of Nome administration is still hoping for construction of the dock in the 2014 season, according to Joy Baker, port project manager.

The City is also in the process of acquiring grant-anticipation line of credit from Wells Fargo Bank for $3 million in order to qualify for the $1million U.S. Dept. of Agriculture Economic Development Administration grant.

PORT OF NOME—Three million dollars are still needed to construct a third dock at the busy causeway.

The Nome Common Council approved the line of credit application at a special meeting Jan. 15 as well as a Port of Nome Capital Improvement Budget comprising long range cost projections.

"We're at 95 percent design. We have $5.4 million in place, City Manager Jose Bahnke recapped. "We are waiting for $1 million from EDA. The permits are in place. We are ready to build the project.

Among other topics the Commission discussed raising the rate for storing vessels on the Port of Nome Causeway. The port administration allowed associates of Phoenix Marine to put a tug on the causeway late in the season before impending harbor freeze up.

"In the past we just said 'No.' It was a last ditch effort, so we just let them do it," Harbormaster Lucas Stotts said.

The crew couldn't take a lowboy trailer across the bridge, according to

Baker, on the phone, piped in, "They didn't plan their fall shutdown too well," she said. "They left their barge in the water too long. It was very poor planning."

"Personally, I don't want boats there," Stotts said. "It's a zoo down there in the spring.

Port administrators and commissioners feared that a boat on the causeway just left there or incapacitated could block cargo transfer and cause the port to lose a significant amount of business. Conversation went from making the winter storage fee very stiff as a disincentive to using the causeway, to a consensus that the fee storage fee be high and if any boat tied up a cell, the company would start paying daily-rate wharfage plus bond insurance and a penalty. The Port of Nome tariff allows for a daily fine as well as a wharfage fee for using the facility.

The panel could not vote on the issue as they were in work session.

The Commission also briefly discussed raising tariff rates for the 2014 season across the board, perhaps by 10 percent.

Not obtaining a required permit, failure to display a permit and/or inspection forms at a construction site or inhabiting a structure without obtaining a permit will draw a $100 Parked vehicles, providing issues for neighbors, public works and law enforcement have their own place in the Minor Offense law-failure to move a vehicle for more than 24 hours, leaving a vehicle unattended or within 10 feet of the traveled portion of the highway, leaving a vehicle on private property of another or on public property, or leaving a vehicle on a highway where it impedes emergency vehicle operation or disrupts traffic, all draw a $100 fine.

'Aren't we overstepping our bounds by enforcing on private property," Councilman Matt Culley wanted to know.

Attorneys Patrick Munroe and Charles Cacciola attended the work session via telephone and will continue to tweak the ordinance.

Infractions would be added to the code of ordinances that have additional stiffer fines with each day of violation a new infraction incurring an additional fine.

Some permit infractions have a fine of up to $300 a day for each day of violation to a maximum fine of $1,000. Tax cheats will draw heavy Building within a coastal flood plain without a required flood plain building permit will draw a fine of up to $500 per infraction with each day a violation exists - meaning a separate infraction.

There are infractions and fines for failure to obey lawful direct orders from the port director. Such infractions must cite specific items in the Port of Nome Tariff as backup.

Still, Councilman Stan Andersen did not seem happy. On the schedule he did not see honeybuckets-containers of human waste resulting from lack of bathroom plumbing or freeze-ups, left outside as a sanitation issue or public nuisance.

"I want to go after the building owner," Andersen said, "not the rentee.

Some proposed making the use of a honeybucket and not connected to the City's sewer system.

"If a person doesn't remove a honeybucket, I want to get into his pocket," Andersen declared. "I want to fine this guy daily. If we do it, I want it to be a fine of $10,000.

Feds fund staffing package for NSHC

By Diana Haecker

The newly released 2014 Dept. of Interior budget heralded good news for Norton Sound Health Corporation as it contained an appropriation of $8.4 million for a staffing package for NSHC.

Tribally run hospitals and clinics have in the recent past not been fully funded to cover operational costs. A Supreme Court ruling found that the federal government must fully fund the contract support costs and staffing for Native health centers nationwide. But only a fraction of the total amount has been paid out.

This has led to Alaska Native health facilities frequently sitting partially empty, as they cannot hire technicians or assistants to deliver health care, said Sen. Lisa Murkowski in a press release.

Norton Sound Health Corporation CEO Angie Gorn said in an email to The Nome Nugget that although NSHC moved to the new facility in March 2013, only $10.8 million was provided in FY13 to fund operations. "NSHC has been anticipating the release of the additional money, which is critical for safe, efficient operations," wrote Gorn. Newly constructed facilities are also awarded a staffing package to not only fund new positions, but also to sustain new facility operations.

At NSHC, Gorn said the money would be used to hire additional staff such as nursing personnel, ward clerks, a physical therapist, information system specialists and secretarial support. "NSHC was recently approved to operate a Swing Bed Program in acute care," Gorn said. The program will enable patients to recover and receive rehabilitation services from stroke, cardiac disease and surgeries in Nome at the Norton Sound Regional Hospital. Additional staffing will be added to support the new program.

Gorn hopes that tribal health organizations will be exempt from sequestration. "Nevertheless, NSHC is staying conservative until this information is released," Gorn wrote.

The NSHC Board of Directors is gathering this week for a regular meeting at the boardroom at NSHC.

Alaska ranks 42nd in the nation for lack of support for emergency patients

WASHINGTON — Alaska received three F's, a B and a C in five categories and an overall D grade in the 2014 American College of Emergency Physicians' state-by-state report card on America's emergency care environment ("Report Card").

This marks a decline from its performance in the Report Card issued in 2009.

"We need to bring all our grades up to the level of our Medical Liability Environment, for which we earned a B," said Dr. Carlton Heine, president of the Alaska Chapter of ACEP. "Because of our geography, our state has unique challenges. However, policymakers must support programs that improve Alaskans' access to emergency care and health overall."

Alaska received an F in Access to Emergency Care related to issues including workforce shortages, the long distances nearly half the residents live from a Level I or II trauma center and low rates of adequate health insurance. It also received a failing grade for its Quality and Patient Safety Environment, but could improve that grade by implementing triage and destination policies for stroke and heart attack patients. The third failing grade was in the category of Public Health and Injury Prevention, principally because the state's public health system is so

Alaska has made great progress and earned a C in the category of Disaster Preparedness. Alaska REthe medical strike team, is part of the national ESAR-VHP system, and the state has high rankings in the number of nurses and physicians registered in the Emergency System for Advanced Registration of Volunteer Health Professionals.

The strongest grade, a B for Medical Liability Environment, is due to having mandatory pretrial screening panels, joint and several liability reform, and a $400,000 medical liability cap on non-economic damages.

"Our state needs to fund and support activities related to vaccination and injury prevention to reverse our poor vaccination rates and highest-in-the-nation rate of fatal occupational injuries," said Dr. Heine. "Emergency physicians save one life at a time, while investment in injury prevention and public health can save thousands."

"America's Emergency Care Environment: A State-by-State Report Card – 2014" evaluates conditions under which emergency care is being delivered, not the quality of care provided by hospitals and emergency providers. It has 136 measures in five categories: access to emergency care (30 percent of the grade), quality and patient safety (20 percent), medical liability environment (20 percent), public health and injury prevention (15 percent) and disaster preparedness (15 percent). While America earned an overall mediocre grade of C- on the Report Card issued in 2009, this year the country received a near-failing grade of D+.

ACEP is the national medical specialty society representing emergency medicine. ACEP is committed to advancing emergency care through continuing education, research and public education. Headquartered in Dallas, Texas, ACEP has 53 chapters representing each state, as well as Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia. A Government Services Chapter represents emergency physicians employed by military branches and other government agencies.

School Board accepts resignations from three key positions

By Sarah Miller

In its regular meeting on Tuesday, the school board accepted resignations from the junior/senior high school principal and the elementary school principal, as well as the district's human resources director. Scott Handley, Robert Grimes, and Donald Stambeck submitted their letters of resignation effective at the conclusion of the current school year. Board members Barb Nickels, Barb Amarok, and Jennifer Reader voted to accept the resignations (Betsy Brennan and Paula Davis were absent), with comments emphasizing the urgency of establishing a rehiring process as quickly as possible.

N i c k e l s stated, "It's important that Mr. Gast bring a plan of action and restructuring if necessary, to the board. We don't want to get behind the ball on this. It's huge to lose both building principals and the HR person at the same time." Superintendent Gast concurred, stating that a plan was already in place, ready for the board to address at its upcoming work session. Nickels also thanked Scott Handley for all that has been accomplished during his time with Nome Public Schools.

After the meeting, Handley stated that he has "really enjoyed Nome and always will. There are great people here, a great school staff, and I leave with no animosity. I love Nome and will miss it." Handley plans to relocate to Oregon to pursue a business opportunity with his son who is a fish biologist. He also commented that the school year was not over yet: "There is a lot to accomplish before May."

Superintendent Gast stated, "I wish them each the best in their future endeavors. Any time we need to hire someone, we want to use the opportunity to find the best possible candidate for the position. We're looking for someone who has the best interests of the kids and the community at heart, someone who will embrace the culture of Nome and the programs we have in place."

The rehiring process will include meeting with faculties of both school to develop profiles for incoming building administrators, and developing screening and interview committees consisting of teachers, parents, and community members. Gast expressed confidence in Nome Public Schools' ability to attract strong candidates due to its positive reputation around the state as a school district with strong programs in place and "one of the most outstanding faculties in the state."

The district will begin advertising for the positions this week. Mr. Grimes and Mr. Stambeck were not present at the meeting to offer their comments.

The school board's business also included recognition of November and December Students of the Month. Archie Olanna and Ayomide Obitayo Ayowole-Obi received the junior high awards. Archie was recognized for his reputation as a hard worker who "always has a smile on his face and is a joy to have class." Teachers praised Ayomide for being 'prepared, helpful, studious, dedicated schoolwork, and respect-High ful." school students Christine Buffas and Oliver Hoogendoorn were also honored. Buffas was described as "a hard worker who is thorough, focused, and motivated." Hoogendoorn was recognized for his friendliness and helpful attitude, as well as for being "intellectually curious, cooperative, and motivated."

Community member Debbie Flint Daniel addressed the board to express appreciation for the Extensions Program. The program was developed by Nome Public Schools to support and connect home schooling families with the district, and became fully in effect as of September 2013. Daniel thanked Mr. Gast and Donald Stambeck for their efforts in implementing the program quickly and stated that many families who home school are elated to be back in connection with the school community through activities including language lessons, sports, the geography and spelling bees, band, and holiday programs. Daniel stated, "There is a lot of work and a lot of learning happening with homeschoolers, and we will continue to support and are proud to be part of Nome Public Schools.'

In the junior/senior high school report to the board, Handley shared a list of programs that are in effect thanks to a generous financial contribution from NSEDC. The programs include Morning Snack, Intramural sports, a cultural dance program, swimming lessons, bowling lessons, JROTC summer camp, and classroom archery. Handley shared that the high school's honor roll boasts climbing participation rates. He also informed the board that the ongoing project of developing a CNA program that is completely local, from classes to clinical training, has been completed. A Health Consortium, composed of instructors from the high school, local college, and hospital staff, will begin offering the CNA training to all residents in Nome who wish to participate.

Faculty members Amelia Budd and Kaley Overbey discussed extracurricular opportunities for students including an exchange program with a sister school in Juneau through the Alaska Humanities Forum, and student leadership and engagement programs. Overbey continues to lead students in efforts to increase student engagement through student-led programs addressing issues such as bullying and substance abuse, as well as increasing connections with the community with programs that capitalize on the cultural assets of elders and community members.

The board discussed Mr. Handley's survey of students attending Mt. Edgecumbe High School in Sitka, following up on Barb Amarok's question from the December board meeting about why families choose to send their students there rather than Nome-Beltz. Handley spoke with parents of enrolled students and reported reasons given by the families that included prior attendance, involvement in athletic or other extracurricular activities, and personal ties such as previous family members attending the school.

In the Superintendent's report, Steve Gast stated that summer maintenance projects on district buildings remain on track. Gast also shared that the elementary school curriculum committee, which began meeting to evaluate and recommend textbook adoptions for language arts and math in November, continues to work on the process but may refrain from making a final recommendation by spring. The process of evaluating a textbook for such broad, comprehensive categories as math and language of curriculum would benefit from more time as well as more input and expertise from stakeholders, reported Gast. Barb Nickels commented that the decision might best be delayed until new administrative hires occur. Gast also commented on positive reports from the City Council regarding Nome Public Schools for its funding request proposals, as well as its diligence in spending and accounting practices. "There was heavy support for, and interest in, Nome Public Schools' proposals," stated Gast.

During Open Discussion, board member Jennifer Reader asked about NPS efforts to communicate with community members. Gast responded that a newsletter is distributed twice a year, in addition to daily electronic reports by Power Schools. Barb Amarok shared a concern relayed by a community member regarding speech therapist services available to students. Sandy Harvey, the Special Education Coordinator for the district, reported that contracted speech pathologists visit Nome monthly, and there is also a full time speech special education teacher at the elementary school. Community members were invited to contact Harvey to further discuss their concerns.

The school board closed with members praising district faculty for the diverse, meaningful programs and activities taking place in Nome Public Schools.

NSEDC Energy Subsidy Information

Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation's Board of Directors recently approved a one-time energy subsidy of $500 per household, to be applied to the electric utility bill, for residents in NSEDC's 15 member communities. NSEDC staff and liaisons will soon be signing up households to receive the benefit.

Who can receive the subsidy?

- Must be a Norton Sound resident in one of NSEDC's member communities
- Must have an electric utility account established as of Jan. 1, 2014  $\,$
- A resident may only claim one primary residence for the subsidy
- Only one subsidy will be applied per household or apartment
- For renters whose electric utility bill is included in monthly rent, NSEDC will have a Landlord/ Tenant Agreement for the renter and landlord to sign, specifying that the subsidy amount will be credited toward the rent

How do I sign up to receive the subsidy?

Sign-ups for the subsidy will occur at set times in each of NSEDC's member communities. Sign-up dates and times vary by community. The planned schedule for sign-ups is as follows:

Community	Date	Location	Times
Brevig Mission	Jan 23-24	Multi-Building	6pm - 8pm

Rohn Buser wins Kuskokwim 300 sled dog race

By Diana Haecker

A field of mushing stars made up the 24 team roster of the 35th running of the prestigious Kuskokwim 300 sled dog race from Bethel to Aniak and back. In the end, it was only seven minutes that separated winner Rohn Buser and runner-up Jeff King when they arrived in Bethel at 9:18 a.m. and 9:25 a.m., respectively, on Sunday morning. The next musher to come across the finish line was Cim Smyth at 10:55 a.m. Within 23 minutes of Smyth, Paul Gebhardt, Joar Ulsom and Jake Berkowitz finished the race. An hour and a half later Ken Anderson and Peter Kaiser arrived within five minutes. Rounding out the top ten was John Baker and Tony Browning.

Nome's Rolland Trowbridge made it across the finish line on Monday noon, 26 hours and 39 minutes after Buser.

According to K 300 race organizer Zach Fansler, the windy, warm and unpredictable weather kept organizers on their toes. "It was very suspenseful going into race," Fansler said.

Challenging trail

A week before the race, warm weather had the race committee thinking that the safest route would take mushers on an overland trail instead of on the Kuskokwim River. As soon as the overland trail was put in, a lot of snow fell and the K300 organizers reconsidered their trail choice. But right before the race, another warm spell hit the Bethel region with sleet and freezing rain.

The overland trail seemed the prudent choice and although it was a bumpy ride from Bethel to Tuluksak, the mushers were happy to have a safe trail.

Between Tuluksak and Bogus Creek, the trail was in good condition. At Bogus Creek and on to Kalskag, it took mushers onto the river, where teams had to slog through one to four inches of overflow. The loop around the Fish Lake area was bumpy again and then the mushers followed the river from Aniak, the halfway point, to Kalskag.

According to Fansler, a grader had knocked over several trail stakes on the river half a mile out of Kalskag, making it hard for race leader Jeff King to find his way. Rohn Buser had left the checkpoint 23 minutes after King.

When King stopped his dog team to scan the river for the next trail marker, his team got in a tangle. Trying to get them untangled, which involves opening metal snaps that were frozen shut, cost Jeff King time.

K300 organizers called in the help of upper trail crew boss Marcus Dammeyer, who went out by snowmachine, found the trail and waved Buser and King into the right direction. "Buser happened to be closer to the trail," said Fansler. According to Fansler, King didn't complain, but said that race leaders are the first to run across trail problems and that's that.

when Peter Reuter lost his dog team when he was bumped off his sled in a trail section full of jumble ice. The dogs continued on the trail without him. Fansler said Reuter called the Kalskag crew and again Dammeyer rode to the rescue, retrieved and secured the dog team, took Reuter to his dogs and they continued on as one unit all the way to the finish line.

There were seven teams from the Kuskokwim region in the race: Pete Kaiser, Mike Williams Jr. and Sr., Richie Diehl, Pete Reuter, Steven Olive and Nathan Underwood. Also competing were John Baker and his partner Katherine Keith. Donald Towarak of Unalakleet was also signed up but didn't make it to the race start.

Martin Buser, Rohn's father, also ran the race and finished in 12th place.

"I am proud to say that once again, we had no musher scratch from the race," said Fansler proudly.

The race is an emotional roller-coaster not only for mushers, who have to overcome trail and weather challenges, but also for volunteers and organizers. Foul weather grounded airplanes and thus crossed plans to fly out food drops and volunteers to the checkpoints. "Here we were on Thursday night, thinking that we need to postpone the race," said Fansler. "We needed to move 17,000 pounds of dog food and 20 volunteers to the checkpoints."

By the next day, weather cleared and organizers were frantically calling local bush planes to deliver the dog food. "I am proud to say that we didn't loose one bag of dog food this year. We didn't lose anything in transit, although this was one of the most chaotic years of all," Fansler said.

The Kusko 300 boasts the third largest prize purse in mushing with a final purse of $111,600. Buser took home the big check of $22,000. The K300 race committee decided to pay up to the 20th position and then pay $400 for anyone who finishes.

Eide makes All-Tournament team at Anchorage games

By Sarah Miller

While the NBHS boys varsity basketball team placed seventh among the eight participating teams at last week's Alaska Airlines Classic Tournament, the Nanooks demonstrated their ability to hold their own against some of the most challenging opponents they will face this season. Teams from Alaska, Utah, and Florida convened for the three-day tournament at West High School in Anchorage.

The Nanooks played the Dillard Panthers of Florida in their first game on Thursday. Tyler Eide scored 20 of the team's 32 points and was the leading scorer for both teams. However, the Panthers defeated the Nooks 81-32 and went on to win the tournament championship.

Next up NBHS played West High School, in a much closer game. The Nanooks dominated the game up until the fourth quarter, in which they scored only 5 points and ultimately lost to the Eagles, 66-58. Eide was again a high scorer, with 15 points and 9 assists, as well as Cass Mattheis with 16 points, no easy task against West's two 6'10" players. Mattheis also boasted his first career dunk in this game.

In their final game of the tournament, NBHS defeated Wasilla High School, a 4A team, with contributions from Mattheis (22 points and 11 rebounds), and 14 points by Klay Baker. In addition, noted Coach Pat Callahan, reserve players including Alex Gray and Bobby Pate were key to winning the game, as Eide and Jake Stettenbenz were sidelined with injuries and fouls. Nome held the Warriors off 49-45.

Tyler Eide was selected for the all-tournament team. "Tyler's ability to score and distribute the ball to his teammates for easy baskets really impressed some of the long time Anchorage basketball observers that attended the game," Callahan commented in an email. He went on to say, "This was a great tournament for our team. We were not going to win any games easily. We faced athletic ability that we won't see again this season. Our players were forced to learn that good teams capitalize on every mistake that we made. We had to play hard every possession. We also found out that we can be a very good team when we limit turnovers and play great defense."

Off the court, the Nanooks were able to experience the legacies and past history of NBHS basketball. Following the game against Wasilla, players were treated to a post-game locker room visit with former NBHS coach Bill Jack. Jack coached the basketball team in the '70s and '80s, working with some of the fathers. uncles, and other relatives of the current players. The players received advice and encouragement from Jack, and later were able to attend two UAA basketball games to watch an NBHS alum (Christian Leckband) play at the college level.

At home, the Lady Nanooks played and won one game against Cordova High School on Saturday. Friday's game was canceled due to the winter storm. Senior Ariana Horner credited the team's freshman players for its victory over the Wolverines when senior players were sidelined with foul trouble and injuries

Both the girls' and boys' teams will face Bethel next weekend, with the girls hosting again the home games. The games will be important for conference standings, and Callahan noted that the boys' team in particular poses a challenge with "exceptional outside shooting from multiple players."

Research finds that an apple a day may actually keep the doctor away

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

You have heard it said, "An apple a day keeps the doctor away." The original 19th century version was somewhat more antagonistic to the medical profession: "Eat an apple before going to bed, and you'll make the doctor beg his bread."

While the proverb has stood the test of time. whether or not the advice is actually true is still a matter of debate.

A group of British public health researchers recently put the apple to the test. They compared the protective effects of eating an apple a day to the protective effects of taking a daily cholesterol-lowering medication, called a statin.

Statins such as simvastatin or atorvastatin are commonly prescribed for people with high choles-Cholesterol-lowering medication can be very helpful to people who have had a heart attack or stroke. It is also good for people who are at high risk of heart disease, like patients with diabetes.

But statins do not help every person who takes them. In fact, between 16 and 23 people with known heart disease would have to take a statin every day for five years in order to lower the risk of a second heart attack in just one patient.

Statins may also help people who have a healthy heart but still have high cholesterol, but more healthy people need to take the medication to see a positive effect. Up to 250 otherwise healthy individuals with high cholesterol would have to take a cholesterol lowering medication every day for five years to prevent one heart attack.

Many medical professionals and public health

everyone over age 50 years, like a daily vitamin.

But statins, like all medications, have side effects. Cholesterol-lowering medications cause muscle pain and muscle breakdown (called myopathy) in some patients. And statins are known to increase a person's risk of developing diabetes.

Which brings us back to the British study published last month in the British Medical Journal. The researchers asked what would happen if everyone over age 50 were prescribed a statin medication and 70 percent of these people actually took the medication every day? Then they asked what would happen if everyone over age 50 were told to eat an apple (or equivalent piece of fruit) every day and 70 percent of these people actually ate the fruit?

The results were enlightening. Both the medication and the apple would reduce the number of deaths from cardiovascular disease by about the same amount. Taken alone statins would save around 9,400 lives and an apple-a-day would save around 8,500 lives.

Statistically speaking there is no difference. As the researchers conclude, "An apple a day or a statin a day is equally likely to keep the doctor away.

And side effects? The researchers found that choosing the apple-a-day would save 1,000 people from developing a myopathy and keep over 12,000 people from developing diabetes from taking a statin drug.

Admittedly apples are more expensive than generic statins, especially in rural Alaska. But apples are available over the counter and as such they are inexpensive compared to the cost of a medical evaluation, lab work, and prescription to treat high cholesterol.

This does not include the saved time-cost of waiting to see a doctor. Even the longest wait in a grocery line is shorter than the wait to see a doctor followed by standing in line at a pharmacy.

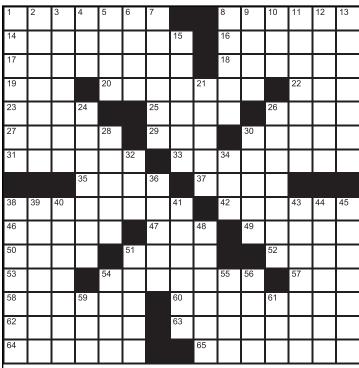

An apple a day becomes even more cost-effective when compared to the costs of treating myopathy and diabetes, up to $30,000 per year.

To be clear, the results do not mean that a person taking a statin should stop. This study was only asking a "What if?" type question. The researchers do not recommend people stop taking a statin and replace the prescribed medication with an apple. That decision is between patient and provider.

This study merely serves as a reminder. When it comes to preventing cardiovascular disease, no pill can match the power of a daily piece of fruit or, for that matter, a walk or a plate full of vegetables. No medication can lower a person's risk of future heart disease like weight loss and smoking cessation. And no blockbuster drug will ever replace the health-promoting effects of salmon and seal oil.

Although a physician may need to prescribe medication to help prevent a future heart attack or stroke, it is worth knowing that an equally effective albeit tastier prevention strategy is available over-the-counter without a prescription. Just ask your grocer which variety is right for you.

Franklin Delano Okleasik was born to Martin and Sarah Okleasik at Teller, Territory of Alaska, on September 19, 1940. He was baptized on that same day.

When spring arrived, the family moved by dog team to Nome where 20,000 troops were stationed during World War II. During his early years in Nome, his father, Martin, would accompany pilot Bill Munz on plane trips to villages as his personal me-

Frankie grew up on the west side of town playing with friends on Chicken Hill. Due to the military presence in Nome, Frankie often sold the most Nome Nugget newspapers. Frankie's love for cooking began when he would follow and help his mother cater dinner parties in Nome.

His mother, Sarah, grew up in the Brevig Mission Orphanage where she learned to cook for large groups of people. As a teen he operated the 20-millimeter movies at the Nomerama Theatre. Frankie joined the Army in 1957 when he turned 17 years old and remained with the Alaska National Guard until 1965.

In 1963, he began working for Alaska Airlines. One day, as he liked to tell, he was driving back from lunch when he spotted a new face entering the east door of the school. LaVonne Sime had just arrived in Nome to teach third grade. Soon after, a full courtship began—driving to see the sea ice forming and new snow on the mountains, regular dates to the movies every week, watching Frankie play City League basketball and being his constant cheerleader, eating Friday night prawns at the Seaview Room.

Frankie was in Anchorage for military training when the 1964 earthquake devastated the city. This event determined their decision to marry. On June 30, 1964, Frank and LaVonne were married at Our Savior Lutheran Church in Nome. Alaska Airlines' benefits provided a short visit to Frankie's new relatives in Iowa and Minnesota and by the spring of 1965 his daughter Sara Anne was born. Frankie and LaVonne had four lively children who were immensely enjoyed.

Frankie worked for the Alyeska Pipeline until 1977 when oil began to flow to Valdez. Frankie was part of the crew that rebuilt bridges on the Council Road in 1977 and the new Safety Bridge in 1978-1979.

Frankie enjoyed basketball. He was asked to keep the books at Nanook games and was praised for being meticulous and exact. Frankie was part of the founding members who began the Lonnie O'Connor Iditarod Basketball Classic.

When Alaska Airlines returned service to Nome in 1980, Frankie returned to work as Lead Ramp until 1990. Frankie loved to travel and the benefits allowed his family to enjoy traveling as well.

Frankie loved good food and began having Sunday night family dinners when his children grew into adults, so that all could get together for a meal. He loved to call on a whim when the weather was nice for a family picnic. He would always be at the grill with a variety of meat, so everyone was happy.

Fourth of July was a celebration! It is LaVonne's birthday, so he would serve steak and lobster out in the country. "Everything tastes better in the country!" Frankie loved his family dearly and would voice how proud he was of everyone, especially his grandchildren. His repeated advice to his grandkids was, "Remember, you're baptized.'

Frankie was preceded in death by his parents Martin and Sarah, his adopted brother Earl Frederick Ernak, his infant son Edward William, and daughter-in- law Denise Oliver Okleasik. #### Judge James A. Von der Hevdt

Anchorage resident Judge James A. Von der Heydt, 94, died Decem-

Judge Von der Heydt was born July 15, 1919, in Miles City, Montana. He is preceded in death by his parents, Dr. Harry Karl and Alice Arnold von der Heydt, and his brother, Dr. Karl Edmond von der Heydt. Both his father and his brother were orthodontists, his father practicing in the early days of orthodontics.

A graduate of Albion College in Michigan, James first came to Alaska in 1943 and worked construction, first on the Alcan Highway and later, on Marks Air Force Base in Nome. In July 1945 he was appointed deputy U.S. Marshal at Nome, serving in that position until August of 1948, when he resigned to attend law school at Northwestern University in Chicago. After graduating in 1951, with a Juris Doctor degree, James returned to Alaska. where he worked construction at Cape Prince of Wales while waiting to take the Alaska Bar examination in October 1951. He served first as U.S. Commissioner at Nome and then as United States Attorney until 1953, when he entered private practice in Nome.

While attending law school, James met Verna Johnson, whom he married in Seattle on May 21, 1952. A few days later, the couple flew to Nome to establish their home.

James was a member of the Alaska Territorial Legislature during the 1957 session. In 1959, when Alaska became a state, he was appointed Judge of the Superior Court for Alaska at Juneau. In 1966, President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed him to the position of U.S. District Judge for the District of Alaska. He will be remembered as a mentor to the Alaska legal community and known for his sage advice, frequently saying, "If you make a mistake, learn to forgive yourself."

His interests were varied and included painting, in both watercolors and oil, and writing. He authored two volumes of Alaska fiction, Mother Sawtooth's Nome and Alaska, the Short and Long of It as well as a collection of poetry dedicated to his wife, entitled Simple Rhymes of Whimsy, and Others (unpublished).

Judge von der Heydt was instrumental in bringing several attorneys to Alaska, including Russell Arnett, also a graduate of Northwestern University School of Law.

At the Judge's retirement party in 1994, the Sweet Adelines sang "Unforgettable," a song that exemplifies his service to the State of Alaska as well as the United States. The September-October 1994 issue of The Alaska Bar Rag quoted speakers at the party who described Judge von der Heydt as "kind, distinguished, gentlemanly, elegant, fair, charming, compassionate and, yes, unforgettable.'

As a youngster in the eighth grade and early high school, James was a Junior Assistant at Trailside Museum in River Forest, Illinois, working with well-known curator Mary Cooper Back and studying birds native to the area, and avian taxidermy. One of his chief avocations while in Nome was the study of western Alaska bird life. He collected 156 scientific avian specimens, all of which were donated to the Univer-

REQUEST FOR PROPOSALS

Bering Strait School District (BSSD) is requesting Proposals from interested General Contractors for the construction of two (2) duplexes, to be used for teacher housing, in Elim, Alaska. Proposals may be submitted to: Bering Strait School District, Facilities Department, P.O. Box 225, Unalakleet, AK. 99684 until 2:00 PM, February 6, 2014. Proposals will be reviewed and scored by a selection compiler and will not be published proposed expenses. committee and will not be publicly opened or read

The project consists of construction services for two duplexes. Each duplex will have one, two-bedroom unit and one, three-bedroom unit of ap-proximately 960 square feet each. A guaranteed maximum price (GMP) based on completed construction is required. A construction schedule with a 2014 completion date is required.

A complete set of project drawings are en-closed. Proposals must include all costs as-sociated with labor, materials, shipping, and Alaska Business License - Contractor must provide a current State of Alaska Business License. Bid Amount: Contractor must submit a bid that is a "lump sum" for completing the entire project, as Construction methods and/or alternatives that meet the project scope and budget limitations will be considered. If alternatives are offered, the Contractor must quantify either a plus or minus impact on the base GMP offered in the Bid Amount. Project Schedule - Contractor must submit a project schedule that identifies a start date, construction milestones with dates, substantial com-Power service, from the Alaska Village Electric Co-op, is to be provided as part of construction proposal. Individual electric meters shall be installed for each apartment, with a separate building meter for the boiler and circulation pumps.

Water and Sewer Services are to be coordinated with City of Elim and/or BSSD and included as BSSD will provide the construction "pad" for of the duplexes. If it is de velopment is required. BSSD will be responsible for this expense.

Great attention must be given to State and Federal minimum property standards as follows:
Uniform Physical Conditions (Federal Register Vol.66, No.227. (These standards are very similar to Section 8 Housing Quality Standards at 24 CFR 982.401).

 State Building Codes (AS 18.56.300) and Building Energy Efficiency Standards (AS 46.11.040)
 All construction inspections must be performed by an ICBO certified professional according to the Summary of Building Inspection (PUR102) and BEES Certification (PUR101). Do not wait until the project is completed to obtain the necessary in-spections and signatures. This may result in re-quiring destructive inspections. BSSD has contracted with Rudy Rudisel (Licensed Architect from Nome, Alaska) to perform ICBO inspections.

Project must meet the minimum accessibility laws:

Americans with Disabilities Act

the barren top layers, grow grass and meet the reclamation standard.

In Alaska we are talking pristing salmon spawning habitat that could potentially be strip mined, say for coal. And after releasing the heavy metals often associated with coal seams, (mercury for instance) into the stream waters, you have some serious pollution problems regarding the growing of any salmon there later

That is not even addressing the fact that trying to restore clean salmon spawning and rearing habitat in a strip-mined stream may be economically unfeasible. If the restoration regulations are not made stiff enough, and not enforced properly, (and you can bet large corporate interests will lobby to keep those costs down as much as possible) then the restoration goal that is met, may not be adequate to replace what has been lost. And once you have opened this door to mining salmon streams, you will not be able to deny other mining claims on other salmon streams.

Do you see my fears?

I understand that our permitting system (for resource development) is complex, sometimes messy, and has to take in a lot of different people's concerns for many different points of view. Unfortunately this is the pitfall of an open democracy where the citizens have a right to know what is being done with the citizen-owned state resources not just a few large resource-extracting corporations that want to make a large profit using our resources. These resources do not belong to the current governor of this state, nor the Commissioner of Dept. of Natural Resources, nor you the "elected state senators and representatives" of the people of the state of Alaska. You are our "public servants" we are not yours. You have been elected by the citizens of the state to represent them, not the faceless corporations that put pressure on you to pass legislation that might be favorable for

Please think about this in the coming weeks and into the new year. You will soon be voting on this important, some say critical HB77 and I hope that some of you will reconsider your previous support and vote for future Alaskans, some not born yet, who hopefully will continue to be able to experience the wonder of a powerful clean environment that can produce incredible renewable resity of Michigan Museums, at Ann Arbor, Michigan.

During his years in Anchorage, he was one of the founding members and first president of the Anchorage Fine Arts Museum Association (now AMA). He served on many community boards, including AFAMA and AMA for many years, the Anchorage Municipal Fine Arts Commission for 21 years, and the Rasmuson Foundation. He was president of the Alaska Bar Association from 1959-1960. He was the master of ceremonies for numerous bar functions for many years. When he was active in the museum he was always the M.C. when one was needed. In 1995, he received the Distinguished Alumni Award from Albion College. He was a member of the American Bar Association, the Alaska Bar Association, Sigma Nu fraternity, Phi Delta Phi, the Fraternal Order of Masons, Scottish Rite, Inns of Court, and Pioneer Igloo #1 in Nome, Alaska.

Alaska Supreme Court Justice Walter L. Carpeneti wrote the following in January-March 2010 Alaska Bar Rag:

"With the work of people like Tom Stewart, John Dimond and Jim von der Heydt, we have a very different and much better system than the one we abandoned in 1959. We owe a great debt to these early Juneau pioneers. I hope we pause for a moment today, 50 years after our admission to the Union, and acknowledge our debts to these greats.'

Judge von der Heydt is survived by his beloved wife of 61 years, Verna, and a number of nieces and nephews.

In lieu of flowers, memorial donations may be made to the Collections Fund of the Anchorage Museum of History and Art, 121 West Seventh Avenue, Anchorage, AK 99501.

Coast Guard

to define best management practices pertaining to Arctic maritime traffic. Ostebo said he is in contact with his Russian counterpart and while the two admirals agree on a traffic scheme, the bureaucracies in their respective countries have to catch up.

A shift in awareness of the growing importance of the Arctic and the recognition of the role the Bering Strait plays as an emerging thoroughfare is happening at the higher levels in Washington, D.C. "The Bering Strait is the next biggest thing since the Panama Canal, I would submit," said Adm. Ostebo.

Repeatedly Adm. Ostebo pointed out that the history of maritime traffic is riddled with accidents.

While the Coast Guard is trying figure out voluntary schemes to bridge the current last maritime frontier of the Bering Strait until the IMO has rules in place, industry is not waiting around to see what regulators come up with.

Global shipping companies have already recognized the savings they can achieve by transporting goods over the top of the world, most notably through the Northern Sea Route over the top of Russia, rather than going through the Panama Canal or the Strait of Gibraltar and the Suez Canal.

In the light of the reality of rapidly increasing maritime traffic, repeated concerns are that the region is not ready in terms of handling major maritime incidents, fires or mass casualty accidents. Nome Mayor Denise Michels expressed the concern of the Nome Volunteer Fire Department that they would be able to handle a fire on a ship offshore.

Ostebo pointed out that this would fall into the Coast Guard's domain.

Also, he lauded the City of Nome's ability to speak the same incident command language as the Coast Guard does in those emergencies. "In this very room here, two years ago, we stood up an Incident Command Center and it was great to see that the City, Nome Volunteer Fire Department and representatives from the Native Corporation trained to speak the same Incident Command language," Ostebo said. He urged to continue key personnel to get training in Incident Command systems and in HAZWOPER. "If you want to know what you can do, get training," Ostebo recommended.

Port Clarence

A few years ago, when the LORAN station closed at Port Clarence, the Coast Guard, as the owner of the facilities and 2,500 acres of land, seemed to have no use for the property. There are relatively modern facilities including a runway, and fuel tanks, but in light of the importance of the Bering Strait and the natural deep-sea port at Port Clarence, the Coast Guard will reconsider its thoughts of getting rid of the entire land package. The Bering Straits Native Corporation had shown interest in acquiring some of the property.

We woke up one morning to the fact that the world has changed and the Coast Guard happens to own property at Port Clarence," Ostebo said. Now the Coast Guard is contemplating holding on to a piece of Port Clarence to keep their options open. In terms of divestiture of the property, Ostebo explained, other federal agencies would have the first option to acquire it. If there are no takers, then the State of Alaska would have the option to get it. The next in line to acquire the land would be the Native Corporations and if there are still no interested parties, then industry offers would be considered. But for now, Port Clarence is not yet for sale. "It's a great port, with 35 feet of water where we could even put boats to overwinter," Ostebo said. "It's a port of refuge, with a runway and a road to Nome. It promises great opportunity."

Nome

Closer to home, Nome will see more Coast Guard presence boarding fishing vessels and the gold dredging fleet. The last two years, Captain Paul Mehler said, the Coast Guard took an educational approach to boarding gold dredge vessels and making sure they are in compliance with safety regulations. This will now shift to a more stern approach. Harbormaster Lucas Stotts said he appreciated the many boardings that the CG 110-ft cutter did last summer.

City Manager Josie Bahnke said last summer there were 150 vessels waiting to dock at the Port of Nome, making the building of a middle dock between the two existing docks at the causeway a necessity to ensure better service to ships coming in to offload and take on cargo. Denise Michels asked the Coast Guard to continue sending the smaller cutters, referred to as "110's" to Nome to conduct boardings and also drug enforcement. Mayor Denise Michels voiced a concern on behalf of the Nome Volunteer Fire Department how to deal with fires that happen in the maritime environment. Stotts reported to the Admiral that last year, two major fires occurred inside the harbor. The more serious fire occurred on the gold dredge Argo and was attributed to mishandling of equipment and poor storage of oil.

Bonanza Fuel manager Scot Henderson reported that the Bonanza tank farm has expanded and will this summer be able to accommodate six million gallons of fuel as opposed to 3.6 million gallons of its former storage capacity.

age capacity.

If only Nome had a deep-draft harbor, said Stotts, this would aid in safer transfer of fuel. If fuel deliverers could arrive in Nome with big tankers instead of many smaller barges, fuel could actually cost less for the Nome consumer. Stotts added that the transfer of oil would also be safer if the tankers could just dock next to the headers and plug their hoses in for upland transfer, rather than having a tanker sit offshore, transfer oil to a barge and have the barge come into the Nome harbor to offload the fuel.

This week, City Mayor Denise Michels, City Manager Josie Bahnke and Port special projects manager Joy Baker are in Washington, D.C. to present the federal priorities list for Nome. On top of the list are Nome Port expansion and the construction of the middle dock at the causeway.

2014 Arctic Shield

While Arctic Shield 2013 focused on western Alaska and the Bering Strait, it continued a three-pronged approach with outreach, operations and capability assessments, called domain awareness in Coast Guard speak. For the upcoming summer season, Ostebo said to expect a bigger Coast Guard presence with buoy tenders, 110-feet cutters and the larger cutter Alex Haley on a regular basis in the region. Now that the Department of Defense has released its Arctic Strategy, Ostebo said, the operation Arctic Shield will be continued in perpetuity. The DoD's Arctic Strategy states that the United States has a national interest in preserving all of the rights, freedoms, and uses of the sea and airspace recognized under international law. "The Department will preserve the global mobility of United States military and civilian vessels and aircraft through the Arctic, including through the exercise of the Freedom of Navigation program to challenge excessive maritime claims asserted by other Arctic States when necessary, said the DoD Arctic Strategy. The DoD supports the U.S. accession to the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. The law codifies rights and freedoms that the DoD seeks to preserve; it aims to solve disputes peacefully and ensures international recognition of rights to resources that extend out to the continental shelf.

COAST GUARD UPDATE— US Coast Guard Rear Admiral Thomas Ostebo updated the Nome public on the Coast Guard's 2014 plans in the region. Among those attending the meeting were Nome City officials, Port commissioners and Native Corporation representatives.

Ostebo said that in the role to support that national defense strategy, the Coast Guard's operation Arctic Shield would continue for years to come.

Shell continues drilling

The Coast Guard also plans to keep an eye on Shell's continued drilling efforts in the Chukchi Sea, if necessary permits are issued.

Last fall, Shell submitted revisions to their 2012 exploration plan to the Department of Interior. The plan details Shell's exploration program for multiple wells in the Chukchi Sea for 2014. Last week, the federal Bureau of Ocean Energy Management sent out a second request for additional information to Shell regarding their plans on operations, environmental, air quality and the integrated operations plan. The Environmental Protection Agency terminated Shell's air quality permit for the Noble Discoverer in December 2013. BOEM's letter to Shell also says that regulators are "seeking assurance from Shell that not only have the physical deficiencies been resolved, but also if Shell's management/oversight deficiencies that allowed the physical deficiencies to remain undedicated or unresolved throughout the course of operations have been fixed.'

Adm. Ostebo said that the Shell fleet, if permitted, would begin moving towards the Chukchi Sea in May, get to the site around July and operate at the Burger lease in the Chukchi until September. There are no plans to continue drilling in the Beaufort Sea

Ostebo said the Coast Guard plans to have two land-based helicopters in Barrow and a Coast Guard buoy tender at the Shell drill site.

Nome at 51°F: Record high temperatures melt winter away

By Diana Haecker

On Monday, January 27, the mercurv in Nome hit 51°F under sunny and clear skies. With this astoundingly high temperature, Nome not only set the all-time high temperature record for any day in January since weather data keeping began in Nome in 1907, but also tied with a five-month high temperature record held on November 1, 1926.

The previous day record of 43°F was set on January 27, 1963.

Monday shattered the previous high temperature record, set on January 7, 1942, with 46°F.

Ironically, January 27, 1989 was the day to set a record for the extreme low at -54°F – a 105° F temperature differential from one extreme to last Monday's extreme

On Sunday, January 26, the measured temperature in Nome was 43°F, breaking a previously high for the same day in 1963.

Jerry Steiger, meteorologist-incharge at the Nome post of the National Weather Service said this month is headed toward a top-ten finish in the all-time high temperature records for January.

But there have been other January months with even higher tempera-

Take 1963 for example, Steiger said. That year, there were eight nearly consecutive days in January with record highs.

Council outlaws belligerent bowsers

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council has adopted an animal control ordinance that replaces the previous law with measures addressing control and animal care—licensing, impounding, adoption of unclaimed, abandoned or surrendered animals, vaccinations, biting dogs/rabies control, and on the other hand, sanitary enclosures and sanitary exercise, humane animal care, cruelty to animals, protective custody, dog teams and trapping with such mechanisms as steel jay traps, snares and spring traps within 50 feet of residences and in certain areas within city limits.

After lots of work, the law emerged, hashed out and done to a "T:" Errant dog drivers without a bell on their team to warn of their approach or face a stiff fine.

Some councilmen found the law draconian.

They suggested that perhaps the bell requirement could be a law, but with no fines attached. Not good, said John Papasodora, chief of police, said a law on the books not enforced could leave the City open to liability.

"We live in an extremely litigious society," Papasodora observed.

Dogged dog driver Janet Balice could see no use of bells in modern

"Is it needed?" she queried the Council.

"Before cars, you heard the bells and the dogs," Mayor Denise Mayor Denise Michels offered.

Councilman Jerald Brown ended the debate by suggesting that mushers with no bells on their teams suffer a fine of $5 for the first offense, followed by $7.50 for the second and $10 for the third and each subsequent offence.

Fines and fees back up the law. Civil fees, as impound fees, to cover room and board may be appealed to the city manager. Fines can be appealed to the Alaska Superior Court and then on up to the Alaska Supreme Court.

Some parts of the ordinance pertain, like licensing, to dogs, cats and horses. Other parts, such as the ban on cruelty to animals, apply to all animals.

The ordinance empowers enforcement officers to enter onto private property on which an animal is located and to require the owner of any animal to provide proof of license and vaccinations upon proba-

Fluoride flows again into Nome's potable water supply

Monday, January 27.

Last week, Martin Wortman, utility specialist with the Alaska Native Health Consortium, arrived in Nome to install the proper equipment at the Beltz pump house to inject the proper amount of fluoride into Nome's potable water.

Nome gets its water from Moonlight Springs. From there, the precious commodity flows to the Beltz pump house behind the Nome-Beltz school apartments. At the Beltz pump house only chlorine and now fluoride are added. The water flows from there to Nome-Beltz High School and to town to serve the entire city of Nome.

Wortman was busy on Friday to set up two so-called fluoride up-flow saturation tanks.

Wortman explained that he first added 100 pounds of sodium fluoride in powder form per tank and made a mark at the 100-pound minimum.

He then added another 100 pounds of sodium fluoride on top and marked the 200-pound maximum on the outside of the tank. The marks on the tank give the water operators a visual of how much powdered sodium fluoride should be in the tank.

In order for the system to work properly, the amount of sodium fluoride powder should be in the range between 100 and 200 pounds.

The powder sits on top of a diffuser and as water flows from the bottom of that tank, it is infused with

Letters -

Dear Editor,

I was attending the Nome/Beltz High School Girls Basketball Games this weekend. Our Girls did Great. And it was especially touching in the recognition of Mr. Danny Karmun and his late Ethel; they have been steadfast in their support of the Nome Nanooks thru the years.

However I must say that I have a big problem with some of our leaders and officials who don't even respect our nation's flag as a symbol of freedom; to even have enough dignity to lift their hand to the heart, recognizing the freedom for which many have paid so dearly to protect. What's wrong with you folks? Can't you at least show our children and young adults the proper way? You know better than to stand there like a lame duck, and yet one official did not even stand. Shame, shame on you! Sincerely,

Erna S. Rasmussen Nome, AK 99762 To the people of Nome:

I have been thinking about something that happened last summer. While much time has passed, I wanted to address these things now.

Last summer you may remember that there were killer whales chasing other whales near Nome. I remember hearing that one man went over to the pod of killer whales. When I heard about this man, I was worried.

As young hunters, we were always told to never investigate when killer whales are hunting. These animals do not play around; we know what they can do. When killer whales are hunting, they are responding to instinct. Their prey may run to the humans for safety. We have seen this. The prey may swim to hide under the man's boat and the killer whales may track the prey and cause the boat to capsize and put the man in danger.

Our Elders warned us about these killer whales. I wanted to share their wisdom with the community.

Strings Cut

In particle physics there are string theories, in the dairy case there is string cheese, Pinocchio had strings (and a long nose), guitars and banjos have strings. It seems the world is just one big ball of twine. The world of politics is tied up in strings, yet our governor has presented us with a big education package tied up in knots.

Governor Sean Parnell wants to divert public money into private education. Public schools have been struggling to continue on flat funding for the past several years. Now Parnell hints of more money for education but wants to give it to private schools. Whatever happened to the separation of church and state? Can we hear our founding fathers rolling themselves smooth in their graves? Do we want to fund religious schools with public money? No way! Our public educational institutions are what make us a great nation. Let's not suck the life blood out of our public schools by diverting public money into the school of the Church of the Here and Now. If folks want private schools let them fund them with private dollars.

Alaskans need to make sure our public schools are of the highest quality. Our public schools are our future and our children deserve the best education we can provide. We can't let our governor and legislature sit on their hands and make a mealy-mouthed pretense of supporting public education. Put the bucks into our classrooms and don't even think about funding private schools or paying vouchers. Cut the strings. Don't shortchange our future. — N.L.M.—

Legislature: Senate Bill to boost Arctic infrastructure

Senator Lesil McGuire (R-Anchorage) introduced a bill designed to boost infrastructure development in the Arctic. Senate Bill 140 aims to create incentives to attract private investment to build much needed ports, roads, emergency and telecommunications projects in the vast expanse of the Alaskan Arctic.

"The Alaskan Arctic is in desperate need of infrastructure development both for those who live there now, and for new opportunities that will come with the opening of the Arctic," said Senator McGuire. "Globally, all eyes are on the Arctic because of the changing conditions which will bring new opportunities in shipping, tourism and resource development. In order for Alaskan's to capitalize on this emerging situation, we need to think ahead and begin infrastructure development now, since we have lagged behind in the past.'

The financing mechanisms in the bill are modeled after the Sustainable Energy Transmission and Supply Development (SETS) fund that was created in 2012. SB 140 would give AIDEA loan, bond, and bond guarantee authority for infrastructure development in the specific geographic region of the Arctic. This would increase incentives to encourage private investment and partnership with the state.

The financing tools in SETS are currently leading to the first commercialization of Alaska's North Slope natural gas while bringing much needed energy relief to Interior Alaska in the form of LNG trucking to Fairbanks. "Over the last year of meetings with the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission we had vast discussions regarding how we can craft an Arctic policy for Alaskans, and what that policy will look like," McGuire said. She added that there are an estimated $100 billion of private funding, looking for investment opportunities in the Arctic.

The World Economic Forum has recently identified investment in Arctic infrastructure as one of the top four challenges and priorities for the Arctic region. Globally, the Arctic has roughly four million residents with an annual economy of $230 billion. This is expected to increase in the future. Aside from certain areas in Norway and the western Russian Federation, the region remains vastly underserved by transportation, ports, communication and other critical infrastructure.

In SB 140 the Arctic is defined as, "the area of the state north of the Arctic Circle, north and west of the boundary formed by the Porcupine, Yukon, and Kuskokwim Rivers, all contiguous seas, including the Arctic Ocean, and the Beaufort, Bering, and Chukchi seas, and the Aleutian SB140 is one of the first pieces of Legislation to be introduced as part of the work over the past year from the 26-member Alaska Arctic Policy Commission.

The AAPC will deliver its preliminary report to the Legislature on January 30, 2014. The final report will be delivered on January 30, 2015 — one year from now.

Coast Guard moves to new home

A ribbon cutting ceremony for Coast Guard Sector Anchorage's move to the Alaska National Guard Armory at Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson will take place Friday, January 31.

The ceremony marks the transfer of Sector Anchorage operations to the new facility attached to the Alaska National Guard Armory. Sector Anchorage has the largest geographical area of responsibility within the Coast Guard and includes the Gulf of Alaska, the Bering Sea and the Arctic Ocean.

"This move presents an opportunity for the Coast Guard to build on our relationship with the state employees and military service members working on JBER," said Capt. Paul Mehler III, commander, Sector Anchorage.

"We look forward to forging an even stronger bond with our federal, state, local and tribal partner agencies as well as the maritime industry as we continue to serve the people of Alaska from this state of the art fa-

State of the State focuses on education

Governor Parnell gave his annual State of the State speech last week, trying to set the tone of the 28th Alaska Legislature about energy and education.

Governor Sean Parnell introduced an education bill to bolster parental choice in charter and residential schools, increase the base student allocation and improve high school graduates' readiness for postsecondary education and the workforce.

The bill would require school districts to determine funding for students in a charter school in the same manner they would for students in any public school within the same district, including funds for special needs, pupil transportation and vocational education.

The bill would increase the BSA used in the formula for state funding of public education over a three-year period. While education funding related to many essential needs, like rising energy costs, has increased, the BSA has not been raised in several years. The increase proposed was based upon percentage increases in recent public employee contracts. For four years, the student base allocation was $5,680. Parnell's bill would raise it about one percent a year for three years. For the upcoming academic year, it would be raised to $5,765. The year after that, it would go to $5,823. Finally, for 2016-2017 the BSA would be set at $5.881.

The National Education Association's Alaska chapter said they appreciated the increase, but that they didn't think a $200 boost over three years went far enough. This year alone, the Anchorage School District requires a $251-increase to the BSA to cover their shortfall as teacher layoffs loom. The Senate Democrats called the increase "terribly small and wholly inadequate.

The governor's legislation repeals the Alaska High School Graduation Qualifying Exam; the test students must pass in order to receive a diploma. Due to robust accountability measures that have been put in place since the competency exam was originally enacted, the governor determined it was time to offer students a more effective option. Senate Democrats remarked in a statement that notably absent from the governor's address was any mention of the $2 billion dollar deficit the state faces this year. In the next 18 months, the governor proposes a withdrawal from the state savings accounts of over $5 billion dollars.

Senator Donny Olson commented on the address saying, ""The Governor laid out an ambitious agenda. It will be a challenge to address these major issues in only 90 days, but the citizens of Alaska expect us to give our best and we will.

"I wish the governor had addressed the fiscal situation we face. We are headed into the second year of deficit spending and I'm worried that our state savings accounts will soon dwindle to nothing."

Upon proof of licensing, an owner may gain release of an animal by paying the following fees: $50 for the first impounding, $75 for the second impounding and $100 for the third and subsequent impounding. At the end of 24 months, the clock starts again with $50. Additionally, an owner would pay $30 a day kenneling fee, with a maximum of $300 for each 10-day period, including the day the animal is impounded and the day the animal is released.

An owner of an animal may surrender it to the City Animal Control Facility for adoption for a fee of $150, provided the animal is older than 10 weeks, owner has proof of current vaccinations, and owner provides an affidavit that the animal is not aggressive and has not harmed a person or other animal.

According to the section on humane animal care, providing such care includes but is not limited to providing wholesome and nutritious food once a day, providing sufficient quantities of fresh water that meet hydration requirements, and adequate shelter which provides adequate air and ventilation and keeps an animal from being exposed to bad weather or in unsanitary, uncomfortable and wet conditions that threaten the health of an animal.

Enclosures—structures, pens, yards and areas must be maintained in sanitary condition with regular removal and disposal of animal wastes.

The new law makes it a violation to exercise animals on property belonging to another without permission. Wastes must be removed to prevent pests and disease.

Cruelty to animals includes intentionally killing an animal unless done humanely or to defend a person or an animal from attack; intentionally or recklessly wounding, injuring, tormenting, poisoning, provoking or unnecessarily overworking an animal; throwing any poisonous substance on exposed public or private place where it may endanger an animal; intentionally harassing or encouraging an animal to fight another animal for sport, training or entertainment. The section applies to all domestic or wild animals

According to the ordinance, animals will not be unattended, meaning running at large without a leash.

The ordinance allows exceptions for certified service animals or areas where no persons other then the owner and his party are present or the animal is under voice command at all times.

"Objectionable animals include animals that lunge and jump at people or make frequent or prolonged noise as a nuisance. Objectionable barking means 20 minutes straight within one hour during the hours 7 a.m. to 10 p.m. and for 10 minutes between the hours 10 p.m. and 7 a.m.

In summary, fines for unlicensed animal would be $50, $75 and $100 for first, second and third offences, and the same for unattended (loose) animals.

The Council also voted into first reading measures exacting penalties and a fine schedule for violations of City ordinances ad authorizing enforcement through citations and providing for the disposition of minor offenses. The law harmonizes penalties throughout the code with State of Alaska law.

Also into first reading went a law banning use, providing, manufacturing or possession and sale of synthetic marijuana and marijuana substitutes like "spice," "bath salts" and any aromatic plant material in granular, loose leaf, powder form or liquid or as a food additive, or as any herbal-type stimulant or hallucinogenic product when the substance does not contain a label with the identity of the commodity or identifying the manufacturer.

The law covering the fine schedule and the law banning dangerous synthetic drugs will come up for second reading, public hearing and final passage at the next Council meeting.

In both instances, the money will go to the prize purses.

The Nome to Council race runs along a tough trail from Nome along the coast to Topkok, over the Topkok Hills, and up the Fish River to Council and back to Nome.

The Nome Kennel Club formed in 1907. The vote was unanimous except for Councilman Matt Culley who balked at putting the money directly into NKC's prize purse. He would rather give the money to the Kennel Club and have them choose and approve how they would spend it

President Obama signs Alaska disaster declaration

By Diana Haecker

Last week, welcome news came out of the White House in Washington. DC as the President declared the November storms that hit Western Alaska a federal disaster and ordered federal aid to supplement state and local recovery efforts.

Back-to-back storms flooded communities from November 5 through 14, 2013 and left a trail of water damage behind.

In Stebbins, three homes were flooded and rendered inhabitable. In Kotlik, a fast storm surge damaged homes, the city's water supply line and other infrastructure.

The presidential declaration makes available funding to state and local governments and certain private nonprofit organizations on a cost-sharing basis for emergency work and the repair or replacement of damaged facilities to pre-disaster condition.

Jeremy Zidek, Public Information Officer with the Alaska Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management explained that the federal disaster declaration helps public assistance, not individuals. "The federal funds will pick up 75 percent of the cost of disaster assistance and the state pays for the remaining 25 percent," Zidek told The Nome Nugget.

Zidek said preliminary damage assessment estimates pegged the damage to public facilities and infrastructure in the affected regions at $11.6 million.

Governor Sean Parnell declared a state disaster shortly after the storms hit. He had requested public assistance and statewide hazard mitigation grants for the Bering Strait

Regional Education Attendance Area, which includes the communities of Teller, Shishmaref, Stebbins and Unalakleet; the Lower Yukon REAA, which includes the communities of Kotlik, Nunam Iqua and Scammon Bay; the Lower Kuskokwim REAA, which includes the community of Tununak; and the Fairbanks North Star Borough.

"Alaska suffered repeated blows by heavy storms and flooding that have maxed-out our capacity to recover from these events by ourselves," Parnell said in a statement. "FEMA's support, especially with their grant programs, will help immensely in our communities' recovery efforts. I appreciate President Obama's prompt action on our re-

Dolph A. Diemont is the Federal Coordinating Officer for federal recovery operations in the affected area.

FEMA said additional designations may be made at a later date if requested by the state and warranted by the results of further damage assessments.

Marine scientist looks back at Exxon Valdez oil spill

By Laurie McNicholas

The Alaska Marine Science Symposium held last week in Anchorage featured a review of the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill in Prince William Sound and the long, slow recovery process for marine resources damaged by the spill.

Keynote speaker Dr. Robert Spies served from 1990 to 2002 as chief scientist for the federal-state Exxon Valdez Oil Spill (EVOS) Trustee Council formed to oversee restoration of the injured ecosystem through the use of the $900 million civil settlement.

"I look at EVOS as a black swan, a metaphor for a real tragedy, a black swan in the sense that the initial risk assessment for a major accident from the Trans-Alaska pipeline and marine shipment was thought to be in the order of over 100 years," Spies began. "In fact, it was about 10 years after the pipeline was completed we got the Exxon Valdez spill.

This is also a metaphor because this particular incident occurred at a time in our sociological history when we were becoming more and more concerned about man's effect on the environment, particularly about our consumption of large amounts of fossil fuel. There were 1,500 to 2,000 kilometers of shoreline affected in the Gulf of Alaska, and there were real long-lasting effects from this spill.

Spies commended the many scientists at the symposium whose research contributed to damage assessment and restoration of the marine ecosystem following the spill. He summarized the event as follows for hundreds of students present who are too young to recall Shortly before midnight on March 23. 1989, the Exxon Valdez left Valdez at the end of the Trans-Alaska pipeline with 52 million gallons of oil to deliver to California. Three hours later the tanker ran aground on Bligh Reef in Prince William Sound and spilled 12 million gallons of oil. In 1989 the trans-Alaska pipeline was supplying 20 percent of the nation's domestic production and shipping it to the Lower 48.

Several days after the spill the oil pooled alongside the ship, and while it was being decided whether to put dispersants on the oil or burn it, a gale descended on the sound and blew the oil out of control in terms of recovering a significant amount of it. It took three years to remove a good portion of the oil from 1,500 to 2,000 kilometers of shoreline, and a small amount still remains in the beaches. The immediate spill killed an estimated 2,000 sea ofters based on the carcass recovery, 200 to 300 harbor seals based on aerial surveys, about a quarter of a million seabirds based on carcass surveys and 200 to 300 bald eagles. In the past 20 to 25 years most species have recovered. except for herring and killer whales.

Causes of the EVOS

Spies said you can look at why the spill happened from two levels. He noted that the captain of Exxon Valdez (Joseph Hazelwood) drank at least one or two beers before boarding the ship. Spies said the captain left the navigation channel to avoid ice from the Columbia Glacier and then went below with orders to officers to bring the tanker back into the navigation channel, but instead it hit Bligh reef.

On a deeper level Spies said causes of the EVOS include the inaccurate 100-year risk assessment, a lack of readily available cleanup equipment and a lack of radar tracking for tanker vessels in Prince William Sound.

"It added up to complacency and a lack of preparation," he added. "I think we need to take human complacency into account when we start thinking about going into more challenging environments like the Chukchi Sea." Public reaction to the EVOS prompted Congress to adopt comprehensive oil spill prevention and liability legislation in the Oil Pollution Act of 1990.

In the days and weeks following the EVOS, oil spread into west Price William Sound, down to the southwest passages, along the Kenai Peninsula, up into Cook Inlet, down to Shelikof Strait to the east side of Kodiak Island and eventually into the Gulf of Alaska where it broke up, Spies noted. He said there is now good evidence that intertidal areas from which oil was removed with heated seawater under high pressure have not recovered, but some argue that near shore predators may have been affected if the aggressive oil removal method had not been used.

Opposite research findings

Government scientists conducted hundreds of studies for 20 years beginning in 1989 to assess damage, recovery and ecosystem restraints to recovery from the EVOS, Spies noted. "Exxon had an army of people who were essentially duplicating in many cases the studies that were done by government scientists," he added. "I've often been asked, 'Why did people come to such opposite conclusions about the environmental impacts of this spill?' The answer lies partly with different definitions of injury, different standards of proof, different frames of reference, particularly geographically, different power of studies to show impacts, and I think some real obfuscation."

Spies said studies by government scientists of the effects of oil contamination on pink salmon juveniles in the sound at the time of the spill vielded findings that Exxon scientists refused to accept. Two separate studies by government scientists of juvenile pink salmon collected from oiled and unoiled areas of Prince William Sound showed the juveniles from oiled areas grew less than those from unoiled areas. A related study by a government scientist on the vulnerability of salmon during their growth period showed salmon need to reach 16 millimeters in length to prevent pollock and similar predators from eating them. A study of salmon tissues showed exposure to oil in the wild, and lab studies revealed that oil in food at low concentrations decreased the survival rate of juvenile salmon. In addition, the mass hatching of pink salmon decreased.

"All this added up to an injury that I thought was pretty convincing," Spies said, "but the Exxon scientists still maintained that we don't know where the juvenile salmon were between the time they were getting out of the streams and the time they were collected in the oiled and unoiled areas; therefore, there could have been another event, and we don't accept it. That's the typical kind of argument we had.'

Policies and politics

In 1992 and 1993 pink salmon returns decreased markedly in Prince William Sound and in 1993 and 1994 the herring population crashed to less than 30 metric tons, Spies said. During that period Charlie Cole served as attorney general under Gov. Walter Hickel.

Spies said Cole became interested in the research process following the spill and greatly influenced it. In 1993 Cole attended an EVOS Trustee Council meeting during which Spies described damages from the spill and presented a research budget request for $26 million. Spies said Cole asked him to develop a workable program for $13 million, and he did.

"That was a turningpoint in that the peer rev i e w process became a lot stronger,' he added.

studies that we initiated in 1994 in response to the lack of recovery in a lot of species took a much broader view than just the ones killed in the first several years, and we began to try to understand the ecosystem in terms of why things weren't coming back to where we thought they should be," Spies said. "And those ecosystem studies and the integrated nature of those studies have great benefit both in science and also breaking down institutional barriers. I think it was a great thing.'

In 2002 Spies resigned as chief scientist for the EVOS Trustee Council to write a book titled, "Long-term Ecological Change in the Northern Gulf of Alaska," published in 2006.

From 2002 to 2006 Frank Murkowski served as governor of Alaska. "During this period there was a big disagreement over the Gulf ecosystem monitoring program, and...the lead scientist at that time got fired, I think probably because he tried to defend the program," Spies said. "Governor Murkowsky was no friend of long-term monitoring.'

Impacts of climate change

"I think the long-term climate change is a train wreck, and the EVOS is a glass of wine spilled in the dining car."

- Dr. Robert Spies

Spies compared the future impacts of long-term climate change on the marine environment with damage done by the EVOS. "We've had some clues about what might happen with marine ecosystems with climate change, and I think the 1977 regime > shift is one we might look to," Spies. "We saw huge changes on the Gulf of Alaska shelf.

I think the long-term climate change is a train wreck, and the EVOS is a glass of wine spilled in the dining car."

Chukchi Sea oil drilling

Spies is opposed to oil drilling and extraction in the Chukchi Sea.

'We shouldn't be doing this," he said. "It's my personal opinion the margin for human error is much slimmer in the Arctic. It's a much more challenging environment. And I think this cleanup of oil spills based on what we've seen in the past, where the most oil that's recovered is about 15 percent is essentially window dressing. Maybe there are protective measures that can be made for wildlife refuges and so forth, but once oil gets out in the ocean under any kind of turbulent, windy conditions ..., you're not going to get it back.

Dawson City man takes world record moose

A bull moose taken by Heinz Naef of Dawson City during the fall 2013 moose hunt in the Yukon Territory has been verified by the Boone and Crockett Club as a new world record moose.

Naef of Dawson City, Yukon was hunting along the Yukon River near Stewart Island on Sept. 22, 2013. Naef carried a .303 British with open sights and 180-grain Winchester ammunition. The hunter stalked to within 35 yards of the big bull before taking the shot. Naef was hunting for winter meat, not a trophy. He removed the antlers from the skull with a chainsaw, nicking them in the process, and did not keep the cape for a shoulder mount.

The antlers measure 75-5/8 inches at the greatest spread. The left side has 17 points and a palm measuring 17-5/8 inches wide by 51 inches long. The right antler has 19 points and a palm measuring 23-6/8 inches wide by 50-7/8 inches long. The antler circumferences are 8-4/8 and 8-7/8 inches on the right and left sides, respectively.

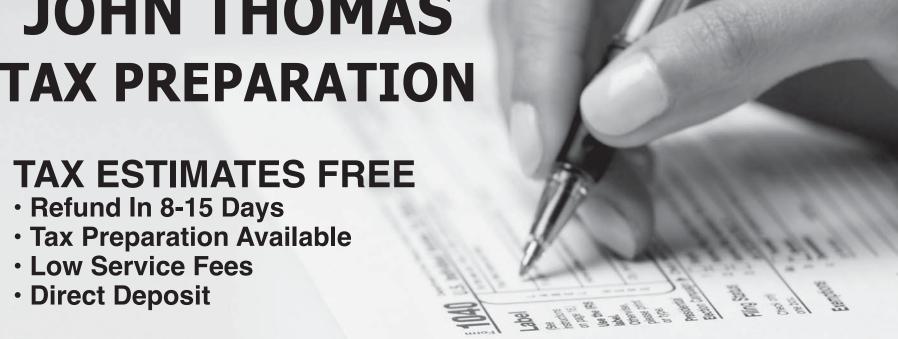

With a final score of 263-5/8 Boone and Crockett points, the bull has the largest antlers ever recorded for the Alaska-Yukon moose subspecies. The previous record, taken in Alaska in 1994, scored 261-5/8. These are the only two specimens on record to score over 260. The thirdlargest bull scores 256-6/8.

Since 1906, Boone and Crockett's trophy data has been used to measure the success of conservation programs across North America. The Club's scoring system rewards antler and horn size and symmetry which are classic symbols of outstanding habitat, strong recruitment of animals into older age classes, sustainable harvest objectives and other elements of sound wildlife management and fair-chase hunting.

Spelling Bee crowns old, new champions

By Diana Haecker Bethany Daniel remains the undefeated champion at Nome Elementary School's annual Spelling Bee contest. The sixth grader again took home the overall champion title as well as winning the sixth grade competition. Bethany also won last year's NES spelling bee both as the fifth grade and overall champion.

Runner-up and fifth grade winner is Hailey Goodwin; Bode Leeper won the fourth grade division and Devon Crowe was the champion for third grade.

In all, 40 third through sixth grade spellers participated in the NES competition held on January 22. The winning championship word was "propulsion."

Grades 7 and 8 competed in the Junior High Division, with eightgrader Katie Kelso winning overall and eighth grade. Overall runner up is Julie Jackson and seventh grade winners are Brayden Bahnke and Shyloah Shannon. The winning championship word was "laureate." Katie Kelso was last year's junior high division Spelling Bee runner up.

Katie Kelso and Bethany Daniels will compete in the Alaska State Spelling Bee in Anchorage on February 28.

In all, 14 students participated in the junior high division, held on January 23 at the Nome Elementary

Or 1977 was the year with the warmest January on record, with an average temperature of 26.8°F.

A large high pressure system sitting over western North America keeps most air funneling from the North Pacific to Alaska. While Alaskans sit on the warm side of the ridge, several Midwestern and even southerly states in the Lower 48 experience very cold temperatures and snow storms.

A warm winter so far has done its share to cause several school closures in the Nome School district, to create hazardous road conditions and to depress hunters, dog mushers and snowmachiners as they wince at the sight of rapidly disappearing

The Nome Post of the Alaska State Troopers issued a warning for deteriorating trail conditions. Troopers say that a snowmachiner trying to cross Golovin Bay has lost his machine in open water.

Also searchers had to bring home hunters, who were stranded at the Fish River flats due to open water.

"Travel is not recommended due to large amounts of deep overflow and open water on the rivers," reads a AST travel advisory. "There is a large amount of slush, making travel difficult on the trails. Golovin Bay ice is melting and travel across the ice is not recommended and extremely hazardous.'

On Friday, Nomeites woke up to the sound of rain pattering on the roof. Once it hit the frozen surface, however, it was more than just an unseasonal inconvenience.

The ground turned into one sheet of glare ice, causing Nome Public Schools to cancel school again, just like the previous Friday. Nome Preschool, Kawerak's Headstart and many businesses followed suit and stayed closed. Schools in the Bering Strait School District were open.

The DOT road crew worked overtime on the weekend to keep roads passable. While driveways and sideroads resemble ice skate rinks, main traffic arteries are ice free and show gravel.

DOT Superintendent Evan Booth said the State DOT maintains the Teller Highway up to seven miles at Snake River, the Council Road up to Farley's camp and the Kougarok Road up to Banner Creek at mile 13. "The DOT worked overtime through the weekend to keep things moving along," said Booth.

The DOT's sand truck spread a sand/salt mix on city and state roads to provide traction at bad spots, intersections and school bus routes.

According to troopers and Nome police dispatchers, there were no weather related accidents or injuries reported.

Dog races scheduled by the Nome Kennel Club have been postponed or canceled so far due to poor trail conditions.

Despite warm conditions along Sled Dog race is still scheduled to start in Fairbanks on Feb. 1.

Elsewhere in the state, an avalanche crashed down on Saturday and blocked the Richardson highway leading to Valdez. The National Weather Service issued a flash flood watch because the Lowe River remains blocked by a100-foot wall of ice and snow from the avalanche and water is caught behind the avalanche

LADY NANOOKS— Playing for the Nome Lady Nanooks Varsity team, Tamaira Tocktoo brings the ball down the court in the game against the Bethel Lady Warriors.

Nanooks versus Warriors in two-day tournament

By Sarah Miller

Undeterred by weather conditions that caused multiple cancellations and closures around town, the Lady Nanooks played back-to-back games against Bethel this weekend, defeating the Warriors in both games.

Friday's victory was a close game, with 11 points contributed by freshman Ivory Okleasik, and 9 each by Ariana Horner and Addy Ahmasuk. Bethel led during the first quarter, and while Nome caught up in a big way during the second quarter by scoring 11 points, it was still Bethel's game at half-time. The Lady Nanooks kept the Warriors at bay throughout the remaining half to win by one point (36-35).

On Saturday, the teams repeated a similar pattern, with Bethel ahead in the first quarter, and Nome passing them in the second quarter with 13 points to their 3. Bethel came back in the third quarter but ultimately lost to the Lady Nanooks by 7 points (final score 39-32). Addy Ahmasuk was again a key scorer with 11 points, as well as Tamaira Tocktoo with 6, but the biggest contribution of the night came from Senora Ahmasuk, who put 15 points on the board for Nome.

Meanwhile, the boys' team faced the Warriors on their turf, with Bethel enjoying home court advantage. Large crowds added to the intensity of the tournament. The Nanooks struggled in the first half of Friday's game and had to battle back from a 13 point deficit. By the last two minutes of the fourth quarter, Nome managed to close the gap to just 2 points but ultimately lost by 7 points (final 41-34). Pat Callahan, NBHS coach noted, "Both teams shot a very low percentage in this game. Bethel made up for a low shooting percentage by outrebounding Nome at the offensive end 14-7." Nome's leading scorers were Tyler Eide (12 points) and Cass Mattheis (9), with contributions from Klay Baker, Matt Tunley, Daniel Head, and Jake Stettenbenz.

On Saturday, the Warriors continued their sweep. Nome fell behind early on with some missed shots and struggled to make up ground. Bethel's team dominated in defense and Nome's three point shooters scored only one out of 11. In turnovers, Bethel committed three as opposed to Nome's 10. Despite a high-scoring game for Eide (21 points), with help from Mattheis (10 points), Baker and Head, the Nanooks lost by 14 points (final 52-

Callahan commented in an email, "Both teams made exactly the same number of field goals in the games. The major difference in scores was Nome being outscored from both the 3-point line (Nome with 8 shots, Bethel with 13), and Nome was also outscored 21-2 at the free throw line in the two games combined. For Nome to be successful against Bethel we will need to again slow the pace of the game down and do a better job of getting to the free throw line.

The Nanooks face Unalakleet next weekend, with the boys hosting the home games and the girls on the

Which caffeinated beverages are good for you?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Most people know that drinks with caffeine provide a temporary boost in mental acuity and energy. But at what point does caffeine become unhealthy?

Experts recommend a limit of 500 mg of caffeine daily for adults and no more than 100 mg of caffeine daily for teenagers.

People who exceed these limits may suffer from headaches, restlessness, anxiety, or insomnia.

In general one 8 oz cup of tea has around 50 mg of caffeine. The same amount of coffee has twice the caffeine, averaging 100mg per cup. Caffeinated sodas have 35-50 mg per 8 oz can. Energy drinks (like Red Bull, Monster, or Full Throttle) have 70-80 mg per 8 ounces.

Though 500 mg of caffeine daily is the upper limit, this does not mean that drinking 500 mg of caffeine from all types of beverages is healthy. A person consuming ten cans of soda (pop) would be getting 500 mg of caffeine, but this means he or she would also be consuming almost a pound of sugar daily.

Research shows that naturally caffeinated drinks like coffee and tea may have long-term health benefits. For example, coffee and tea may reduce a person's risk of Parkinson's disease, liver cancer, prostate cancer, colon cancer, and dental cavities. Sometimes caffeine is used to treat migraine headaches and even asthma.

Coffee may also ALASKA help prevent type II diabetes mellitus. According to a Har-DOCTOR in the Annals of Internal Medicine in vard study published 2004, men who drink at least four cups of coffee (36 ounces) per day reduce their risk of type II diabetes by over 50 percent, and women who drink at least four cups a day lower their risk by nearly 30 percent. Decaffeinated coffee has beneficial effects as well, but the effect is much less profound compared to caffeinated coffee.

On the other hand drinking soda may increase a person's risk of diabetes mellitus, osteoporosis, and non-alcoholic fatty liver disease. Unlike coffee and tea, drinking soda (pop) is not considered a healthy op-ages. Coffee, tea, and soda can exacerbate symptoms of gastritis or gastric ulcers especially in smokers.

The effect of caffeinated beverages on the cardiovascular system is mixed. Coffee causes a small elevation in cholesterol levels. The caffeine in coffee and tea can strain an unhealthy heart by temporarily increasing the heart rate and blood pressure. These potentially harmful effects are balanced by the positive effects of heart-healthy antioxidants, which are highly concentrated in coffee and tea.

According to research published in the journal Circulation, coffee consumption is associated with a lower risk of stroke in otherwise healthy individuals. The American Heart Association has found no clear adverse effects to moderate coffee consumption defined as one to two cups per day.

It is important to point out that the healthy aspects of coffee and tea do not overcome the unhealthy amounts of sugar and saturated fats added to many specialty drinks. Saying that coffee makes a double tall mocha healthy would be like saying that apples make apple pie good for you. In both cases any health benefits are purely social.

ices. He was proud to be alcohol-free, and often helped people struggling with their own alcohol addictions, even after he was no longer a counselor by job title. He continued to hold talking circles in Nome and in the villages throughout his life. He also served as a counselor for a substance abuse treatment center in Kotzebue, where he lived for a few years. Jones had many talents and had a colorful career, which included time spent as a carpenter, commercial halibut fisherman, and childcare provider.

Jones was an avid sports fan, and he proudly wore the jerseys of his favorite teams, the Miami Heat and the Seattle Seahawks, on game days. He was also very lucky when it came to games of chance. He won many raffle drawings at sporting events, even some where there were thousands of participants. He would often use his winnings to attend his children's out-of-town sporting events.

Jones was first and foremost a family man. He married Phyllis "Punky" Longley in 1988. Though their marriage eventually ended, their lifelong friendship endured, and he loved her always. Together they had four children, his pride and joy, Krystal, Kelly, Mikey and Jon. He was a loving father, and proudly attended as many of their school programs, field trips, sporting events, as he could, and was also there to witness their major life events, such as graduation and his daughters' weddings. He could be counted on to be seen in the bleachers of any sporting event his children were involved in; he continued to cheer them on, even in their adult-

Jones very much loved his grandson Colin, and his granddaughters Kailey and Aliyah, and was very happy their Yupik names were after his siblings, Wangqetelen and Uyguunaq. He was very excited upon hearing the news of another grandchild on the way, as his daughter Kelly and her husband Blake are expecting a child in July. He was a loving family father figure not only to his own children, but also to his many nieces and nephews, and enjoyed hosting traditional food gatherings in his home.

Jones was preceded in death by his parents, Nick and Lucille, siblings Jerry Sr., Floyd, Alma, Robert, Hazel, Joshua and Jennifer, as well as many cousins, nieces and nephews.

He is survived by his children Krystal (Brian), Kelly (Blake), Mikey, and Jon, and his step-children Alexie, Chris and Irvin; his grandchildren Kailey, Aliyah and Colin; his siblings Kathy and Michael (Luisa); his nieces and nephews Sterling, Wagner, Jerry Jr., Judy, Warren, Bertha, Lena, Perry, Sabrina, Diane (Mike), Michael Jr., and Jennifer, and many cousins, nieces and nephews as well as extended family (Wongittilins, Toolies, and Pungowiyis).

Jones was a humble, kind and gentle man. He will be missed by many. He lived well and loved

Wiley E. Scott

Wiley Scott was born in the coal mining town of Pocahontas Virginia on December 24, 1934, a special Christmas gift to his mother Tressa Scott, father Dominick Scott and older brother Donald Scott. The family was completed two years later with the birth of his younger brother Gordon Scott.

He was raised in Bluefield, West Virginia. Upon graduating from Beaver High School he thought he would become a coal miner but after one trip down into the mines.... he changed his mind and decided to join the U.S. Air Force. He was sent overseas to Anchorage, Alaska where he was trained in the Military Police and became a bodyguard. driver and aide to General Atkinson, Commander of Elmendorf Air Force Base. While stationed there he met Katherine at a military dance, and that chance meeting led to 57 years of marriage.

After taking an Honorable Discharge from the Air Force he elected to go to college in Athens, W. Va. where he graduated with a Bachelors Degree. He used the G.I. Bill and took trips to Nome for summer employment to finance the college tuition. His first job in Nome was as a bartender for the Breakers Bar. Another summer he worked construction and when taking a ride on the Teller Highway he was so proud, as he informed us, that he helped build this section of road.

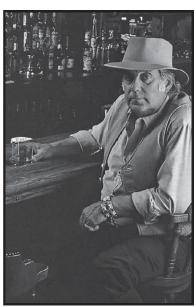

A month after graduation he was presented with his first-born son

Steven Paul Scott and from that time on he dedicated himself to providing a good life for his family. Two years later came another son, Gregg Edward Scott and in another two years his family was completed by the arrival of Michael John Scott. His favorite comment about his sons was that he should have been born a king, since he could so easily produce sons.

After graduation from college he made the decision that he wanted to move to Nome on a permanent basis, so the move was made and there were no regrets to that decision.

His first permanent job in Nome was with the State of Alaska as an Employment Officer. This entailed a lot of bush traveling and the small airplanes were as confining to him as the coal mines. He then went to work as a Dorm Director at the Nome-Beltz Regional High School. He loved the job and working with the young people directly in from the bush areas. All the years later, he was so proud when some young man or woman thanked him for being in their lives and what a positive impression he had made on their lives.

He was still looking for the right job and it came with an offer from Alaska Airlines to be their airport manager. This then led to being their district sales manager and the managing of their ground holdings. This consisted of the Nugget Inn Hotels, One, Two, and Three, and the restaurant and bar. Many good years were spent in that job. When Alaska Airlines decided to sell all of their ground holdings in Alaska, he was offered the chance to buy the hotel and liquor license. At that point he went into a partnership with the King Island Native Corporation.

This proved to be a rewarding partnership and he was very proud to be affiliated with them. Not only in the hotel business but also running their convenience store, Corner Market.

His final business venture was forced upon him when the existing tour company failed and Alaska Airlines offered him the contract. In order to keep the hotel business profitable he had to make sure the tour program was alive and doing well. He picked up the pieces and made a great success of the Hotel and Tour Company

The decision to sell the hotel and tour business came when Alaska Airlines decided to get out of the tour program. He decided on a complete retirement that brought great joy to his wife. Thirty-six years of employment at Alaska Airlines also came to an end. Enough was enough.

Wiley's greatest enjoyment and pleasure came from his family. Fishing, camping, crabbing, river boating

The family of Wiley Scott would like to thank the community of Nome for their loving support to us during the loss of our husband and father.

Our heartfelt thanks go to the staff of Norton Sound Regional Hospital who helped us through this very critical time. The love and caring given to him by the Nursing staff could only be described as extrodinary. Thanks to Dr. Liu and Dr. Oniell for maiking it possible for us to keep him close to home and family where they saw him to a peacful end. Thank you to Dr. Head for his continued support and caring.

Thanks to the Honor Gaurd of the U.S. Air Force for a beautiful and touching playing of the taps. Wiley talked many times of receiving his flag and he did.

A loving thank you to the King Island Corp. for the farwell singing and playing of the drums. It sent him on his jouney to a better and peacful place.

A loving thank you to Patrick McCormack for a beautiful Eulogy. For a man that considered you a son.

Thank you....

Saying it Sincerely

Pastor Charles Brower Community United Methodist Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Society

Blizzards, joyous celebrations, seemingly endless meetings, and the pleasure of children do not seem to have much in common. Recent weather-related transportation problems have tried the patience of even those with the constitution of Job. Within the sorrow of losing a loved one stand the joy of celebrating and reliving the good times shared.

I sat through days of meeting inside a couple of large Gothic-looking churches when I would much rather have been outside savoring the warmth of the sun and shirtsleeve weather, but the work of Church demanded I be a faithful servant and help map out a course for pastors-of-color to navigate in a multi-cultural world when competency in differing cultures demand we be at least as nimble as the next pastor. Our grandchildren were the source of much joy and pleasure as we watched a five year old learn to snorkel and "swim" by herself, still we hovered anxiously nearby. Our God is at work within each of these instances.

Take time this week to reflect on what God has done in your life, even without your invitation for his care. We read in 2 Chronicles 31:21: "In everything that he undertook in the service of God's temple and in obedience to the law and the commands, he sought his God and worked wholeheartedly. And so he prospered." May peace and joy be in your life richly this

Per State Statute .5% of the Shaktoolik schools remodel budget will be spent on art for the school, this amounts to $36.142. We are asking interested artists to submit art proposals for the school. Shaktoolik is an Inupiat Eskimo community of 250 sitting on the Eastern shore of Norton Sound. Activities like berry picking, hunting land and sea animals along with commercial and subsistence fishing are an important part of daily life. The K-12 schools mascot is the wolverine and the school colors are maroon and gold. Art proposals are not limited to style, medium or size. If interested it is strongly recommended that you contact the school for areas that may fit your ideas. The school can provide you dimensions and photos. A selection committee will award the artwork contracts to the selected artists. For additional information please contact Principal Sammons at (907) 955-3021.

For consideration you will need to submit:

- 2 a dimensional portrayal depicting your proposal
- Written narrative of your proposal
- Portfolio of prior work
- A lump sum cost of your proposal, also a cost breakdown of your proposals budget
- 2 references
- An attempt will be made to return proposals to the artists after a selection has been made.

Proposals need to be submitted by Feb 15, 2014 to:

salmon contained mercury or PCBs", and he refers us to FDA saying, "FDA has found no evidence of dangerous Fukushima radiation in the US food supply." What they fail to report is: our FDA refuses to regularly test seafood to find out what are the radioactive isotope concentherein. That may trations be why FDA has found no evidence!

In response FDA's refusal to such testing, Seattle's, Loki Fish company, had their salmon tested, and it is reported at http://healthydebates.com/alaska-washingtonsalmon-tested-radiation/ on 1/17/14, "Alaskan Keta at 1.4Bq/kg cesium-137 and Alaskan Pink at 1.2Bq/kg cesium-134" (a marker confirming it came from Fukushima due to short half-life). Of course, these may be isolated cases, but this evidence calls for regular testing for radioactive isotope concentrations in Alaskan seafood.

In an article by Don Whiteley, "Wild Alaska salmon isn't as pure as advertised" (05/18/04)www.wfga.net/issues.php?ID=60 he commented, "Commercial greed and gross mismanagement by government agencies have combined to destroy or diminish wild fish stocks all over the globe, including the West Coast salmon fishery." He goes on to report that PCB concentration in Alaskan salmon was measured at twice that of B.C. farmed-raised salmon (although, both were quite low and considered far below any alarm level).

So, it is not "misinformation" that Alaska salmon contains a small burden of PCBs, and may be found to a small contain -but increasing— concentration of radioactive isotopes. To coastal Alaskan communities that depend on seafood this is a matter of life and death, so the whole truth is expected from our private professional groups and government agencies.

In order to certify that Alaskan seafood is safe to eat, it is necessary that we have it tested regularly for cesium-137, strontium-90, mercury and PCBs, etc., so that seafood carrying high levels of mercury, PCBs and/or dangerous radioactive isotopes can be excluded from our food supply. This is also critical for Alaskan salmon to remain commercially competitive with B.C. farmraised salmon, since currently it appears that the latter may have a lower concentration of both PCBs and man-made unstable radioactive iso-

Nome Nugget:

I'm glad to see our elected leaders in Washington have approved a plan to allow the federal government to function through 2014. I was particularly pleased to see that Congress has restored some money for Head Start and other investments in the health of our communities and has refused to give the Pentagon all the money that it was asking for.

Congress now has an opportunity to use the regular legislative process enshrined in our constitution to debate and pass a budget that reflects the moral priorities of our nation. Although the U.S. military engagement in Afghanistan is winding down, our country is still spending almost as much on war as we spent at the height of the Cold War or Viet-

I hope our senators, Begich and Murkowski, will work in the next two years to support further cuts in the Pentagon budget, not increases (and stop war-mongering on Iran), with additional investments to meet the needs of our struggling communities at home.

Sincerely. Nathaniel Perrv Shaktoolik, AK

UPFLOW SATURATION TANKS - ANTHC utility specialist Marin Wortman points to one of the two yellow upflow saturation tanks at the Beltz Pumphouse. Water is saturated with the sodium fluoride and pumped from the tanks in a pulsating mode into the main water supply. Wortman installed the system last week in continued from page 1 the chemical as it pushes upward. "The water will flow through and fill the tank," explained Wortman. "The up-flow saturator draws water through the sodium fluoride and then the saturated solution is pumped into the water supply.'

Skinny injector tubes run from the yellow saturation tanks to a pump, which is manually set by an operator, and then into a large water conduit. "Here, feel the pulsating pump action," Wortman said. Indeed, the water solution feels like a heartbeat, rhythmically pumping a dose of treated water into the main water line. Wortman said the system will be set up to infuse the recommended dosage of 0.7 parts per million of sodium fluoride added to Nome's tap

The chemical pumps that put the solution into the main water supply are to be checked by a DEC certified operator such as Nome Joint Utilities water operators Jay Wieler and Jerry West. They are also tasked to monitor the water for the correct amount of sodium fluoride. The tests will be done at the school tank and in town. "One of us will check the pumps and the water at every lift station and pump house," said Wieler.

The checks will be performed seven days a week.

An engineer with CE2 was onsite as well to monitor the installation.

Wortman received the tour of Nome's water system and commented that he has rarely seen such a pure and pristine water source as Moonlight Springs. "We opened the hatch at the pump house at the spring and the equipment looked like it has been installed yesterday," he said. No sediments cloud the water, no iron, magnesium or manganese sully its clarity.

The only chemicals added to Moonlight Springs water are chlorine to give it a level of disinfection and now sodium fluoride. "Nome has great water," Wortman said.

About 400,000 gallons of water flow daily from Moonlight Springs to the school and town.

The city has an ordinance in place that supports fluoride treatment in the municipal water supply. Nome had a fluoridation treatment system in place until a few years ago. NJUS manager John Handeland said that fluoride injection was suspended in 2011 when the equipment ceased to function. "We had plans for a new treatment building to be constructed in 2012, but that was delayed. We worked with ANTHC to procure and install new equipment in the old facility to allow the process to be resumed." The new equipment will be transferred to the new facility, once it is constructed.

The Common Council last year heard residents debate the pros and cons of restarting municipal water treatment with fluoride.

An informal opinion poll during last year's City Council runoff election indicated that the majority of Nome voters support fluoridation of the municipal water supply.

Lack of radiation monitoring irks scientists, public

The lack of radiation data collected from Alaskan waters worries the public and scientists alike as the plume of radioactive ocean water from the failed Fukushima Dai-Ichi nuclear plant is predicted to arrive on the U.S. West Coast in spring of Subsistence hunter Koonooka of Gambell said in a phone conversation from his home that he is very worried about the effects radiation may have on the marine mammals that are a food source for most residents on Saint Lawrence Island. "We keep hearing about radiation from Japan coming our way," he said. "We hope that the state or federal people keep on top of it. We sure like to see someone out there taking water samples."

"We are concerned about the health of marine mammals and our own health," Koonooka said.

Despite public worries, no monitoring is done or concerted effort is being made to track seawater or subsistence sources for radiation.

"The public is upset," said Nomebased UAF Marine Advisory Program agent Gay Sheffield. "I am concerned about the lack of data, the lack of a coordinated and comprehensive response between state and federal agencies."

She reiterated the fact that communities around Nome heavily rely on wild food gathered from the ocean and that this is an issue of food

The lack of data is not comforting, even so state and federal agencies assure the public that no harmful radiation levels were detected in the seawater and in fish samples taken in Washington or Oregon.

Alaska Dept. of Environmental Conservation Commissioner Larry Hartig said in a presentation before the Senate Resource Committee that the DEC does not conduct its own radiation monitoring, but is relying on data collected in Washington and Oregon from the federal Food and Drug Administration and the Environmental Protection Agency.

Food Policy Council meets in Nome

By Diana Haecker

Several representatives of the Alaska Food Policy Council traveled to Nome last week to kick off a series of statewide meetings. The goal was to hear from rural residents what works and what doesn't in the Alaskan food system.

The Alaska Food Policy Council is a coalition of agencies and individuals representing federal and state agencies, tribal entities, schools, university programs, farmers, fisheries, and businesses. The role of the council is to find solutions to food systems problems and as such, their intent was to hear from Nomeites on what works, what doesn't and how the Nome food system can be im-

Gary Ferguson, AFPC board nember and the director of Wellness and Prevention at the Alaska Native Health Consortium, addressed the crowd of about 50 who showed up at the Mini Convention Center to talk food for two hours on Friday afterFood, he said, is something very Alaskans spend $2.5 billion on food per year, 95 percent of food consumed in Alaska is imported - as opposed to 50 percent in the 1950s – and the food industry accounts for 115,000 jobs in Alaska.

Ferguson preached to the converted when he said that subsistence foods such as fish, seal or wild berries are more healthy and nutrient-dense than processed and imported foods. He said that unhealthy food choices and the lack of exercise could be attributed to the rise in obesity and chronic disease in Alaska, costing the health system $459 million per year.

atures in Nome are officially going into the record books as the fifth warmest January on record since the National Weather Service began gathering data in 1907

Deering can boast to have had the state high on Sunday, with 48°F.

On Friday, Gambell had the distinct honor to be the State's hot spot as the mercury soared to 48.2°F.

Gambell hunter Merlin Koonooka reported that he had launched his boat right from the beach to go seal hunting. After a successful trip, he said, the water became choppy and the sky foggy as the hunters returned.

In front of Nome, open seawater shows little wind waves on the surface, where last year ice miners pitched their shacks.

Chickadees chirp in the budding willows. Brown tundra and icy sidewalks are the norm. And while the sun is shining, it is warm, an unusual phenomena for January at this latitude. What is this?

This is a preview of what the future brings," said John Walsh, Chief Scientist at the International Arctic Research Center at the UAF. Climate models suggest that winters such as the 2013/2014 season could become more common toward the end of the century, Walsh said.

"It's not going to happen every year, but it will happen more often."

Letters -

Dear Editor,

I am writing in regards to Senate Joint Resolution 9 (SJR 9) & House Joint Resolution 1 (HJR 1). These bills would result in a ballot measure that would allow a vote of the public to change the Alaska's constitution to allow public K-12 funding to be directed to unaccountable, private and for-profit religious and secular schools. Other legislation would then be used to finance the schools through a voucher under the pretense of "parent choice." Please do not allow this to happen. Research has shown that the voucher system is very expensive and leaves even fewer resources for public education. These resolutions do not support all children and I am against them. Since rural Alaska highly depends on public school funding, I believe it is crucial that this resolution does not become a reality.

Berta Gardner addresses it well in her electronic newsletter dated January 23, 2014.

http://alaskasenatedems.com/senator/gardner/012314_bertas_briefings.htm

She quoted Diane Ravitch, the former US Assistant Secretary of Education under President George H. W.

Bush, who was originally a strong proponent of school vouchers, but as the data emerged she changed her way of thinking. She says:

"Protecting our public schools against privatization and saving them for future generations of American children is the civil rights issue of our time."

I strongly agree with her. Please do not support SJR 9 and HJR 1 and other legislation that would result in reduced funding for our public schools.

Sincerely, Sandi Keller Nome, AK 99762

P.S. I encourage others in our region to write to Donny Olson and other legislators to stop SJR9. The voucher system cannot work in our villages where there is only one school to attend. This means more funding for the urban schools and less for rural schools.

Our Royal Dutch Shell Uncle isn't going to drill in the Chukchi Sea this summer and we are being scolded about the Department of Interior's regulations. There are cries of "unfair", "not a level playing field" and too much "federal outreach." They scream about the Ninth District Court rulings.

We are shedding big tears for lost jobs that we never had. We are touting the impeccable drilling practices of a company that ran a drilling rig aground in what some say was an attempt to get out of Alaskan waters to avoid paying taxes. We should feel sorry for our Dutch Uncle because their stock rose in price as soon as Shell announced it was not going to drill in the environmentally sensitive Arctic this season. Shell spent a lot of money in Alaska but it is not a company to throw good money after bad.

Shell supporters should not be blinded by the smoke screen. The real reason Shell pulled out of the Chukchi is a commodity issue. Oil production in the Lower 48 is plentiful and cheaper to produce and Shell has leases in Dakota, Pennsylvania, etc. It's shale oil and not Shell oil that is driving the barrels to market. —N.L.M.—

With so many political and media buzzards circling over our heads, and waiting to devour what is left of our economy, our ethics, our morality, and our common sense, we have become so brain washed that we can no longer differentiate between good and evil, truth or lies, or even up from down? #### Alaska Arctic Policy Commission issues preliminary report

The Alaska Arctic Policy Commission is going to present its preliminary report to the Legislature this week. The 131-page report is seen as a draft of the final report that is due in January 2015.

"2014 is the Year of the Arctic for the Alaska Legislature. There is a need to make sure Alaska is in the captain's seat as Arctic decisions are made that will affect all Alaskans today and for hundreds of years,' said AAPC co-chair Senator Lesil "Planting a flag in the McGuire. Arctic is like planting a flag on the moon. It is an important symbolic message telling us to push boundaries and move with purpose toward Arctic endeavors. This report is a great step in that direction.'

The preliminary report addresses expanding involvement in the Arctic Council, developing programs to improve community and local inclusion in decision making through state coordination of multi-agency permits, state and federal coordination of permits and plans and meaningful involvement of regional stake holders in development activities or plans that affect them.'

The report also addresses science and research with the recommendation to increase state funding to the University of Alaska's Arctic research. Planning and infrastructure should be assessed by conducting a comprehensive Arctic region economic and infrastructure assessment.

Recommendations regarding oil, gas and mineral resources include the implementation of regional planning efforts that allow local stakeholders to voice their priorities; and to develop a mechanism for revenue sharing from resource extraction for impacted communities.

Tackling the complexity of National security and defense in the Arctic, the Commission decided to spend more time on the topic in upcoming meetings in 2014

The report identified the lack of infrastructure as a key problem for the region.

As for Marine transport and its projected increase through the Arctic and Bering Strait region, the commission encourages the development of integrated systems to monitor and communicate marine information, and support programs such as the Alaska Marine Exchange, which tracks ship traffic in Alaska.

Rep. Bob Herron and co-chair Sen. Lesil McGuire introduced legislation last week to address two of the issues. One bill would create a port authority for the Arctic, while the other would authorize the state to issue loans for projects like roads and harbors. (See below).

AAPC introduces two bills

Representative Bob Herron, cochair of the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission, introduced two pieces of legislation last week to begin implementing recommendations that came out of the commission's one year worth of work and meetings around the state.

House Joint Resolution 24 urges the United States State Department to consider Alaska's priorities and work with the state when the United States becomes Chair of the Arctic Council in 2015. The resolution also asks that the State Department confer with Alaskan officials while considering an individual to lead the Arctic Council.

House Bill 288 is the companion measure for Senate Bill 140, which was introduced by Alaska Arctic Policy Commission co-chair Senator

The Senate Bill and HB 288 creates financing mechanisms backed by the Alaska Industrial Development and Export Authority to attract private investment for Arctic infrastructure projects like roads, ports and broadband internet.

AIDEA investment would cover one-third of a total project cost, leveraging private money to cover the rest, said Herron. "This type of public-private partnership provides the most benefit for the least cost to the state. It creates an Alaskan Arctic economic opportunity zone," Her-

New member on AAPC

Representative David Guttenberg (D-Interior/Wade Hampton) was appointed to serve on the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission. The seat reserved for a member of the House Minority became vacant after Representative Beth Kerttula's (D-Juneau) departure from the Legislature. The Alaska State Legislature created the 26 member Alaska Arctic Policy Commission in 2012 to "develop an Arctic policy for the state and produce a strategy for the implementation of an Arctic policy." On January 30, 2014, the Commission presented its preliminary report and continues to gather input from around Alaska. The final report is due to the Legislature January 30, 2015.

Shell not to drill in the Chukchi Sea in 2014

Royal Dutch Shell won't be continuing its exploration drilling campaign in the Chukchi Sea in 2014. According to the Washington Post, the company slashed capital spending by $9 billion and awaits the outcome of court ruling that challenges the validity of the lease sale in the Chukchi Sea.

Shell had spent nearly $6 billion on leases and preparing an oil exploration drilling campaign at the Chukchi Sea and the Beaufort Sea. In 2012, Shell sent a fleet of support ships and drill rigs to drill in both seas, but the campaign ended with only the top of wells drilled and a long list of problems including the grounding of the drill rig Kulluk near

Shishmaref residents travel to Washington DC

Five Shishmaref residents last month traveled to the nation's capital to raise awareness of their battle with Arctic warming. Shishmaref, located on the narrow barrier island of Sarichef Island in the Chukchi Sea, is eroding away while alternatives to relocate or fortify the village of 600 depend on funding from state and federal agencies.

Village Council president Stanley Tocktoo, Shishmaref Native Corporation President Tony Weyiouanna, his wife Fannie Weyiouanna, Peggy Hersrud and her 17-year-old daughter Debra Hersrud testified at the Bicameral Task Force of Climate Change Forum held on January 14.

Debra Hersrud asked the policy makers to address the issue of climate change at a national level. She talked about how after a storm, they had to evacuate their house and upon coming back, their back stairs were dangling over the cliff in the ocean. Shishmaref is changing faster than I can grow up. [...] It seems unfair to be giving up my home and my culture for a problem that I don't have the power to solve myself," she said, Stanley Tocktoo talked about the residents' fear that Shishmaref is becoming the next King Island. It is common practice, he said, that people put their homes on skids to move them when violent fall storms hit the island. Last year, 18 homes were put on skids and 20 homes had to be relocated. He also talked about residents leaving their homes. "In serious storms, people are forced to evacuate, and when their houses are destroyed, they are stuck, away from home and with no way to come home," he said. "We are losing our culture. We have a warm, communal culture that works together and lives off the land in a subsistence culture. We hunt, and fish, and have traditions that we try to pass on to our children, We will lose that if we are relocated into an area with other people who don't appreciate our way of

Tony Weyiouanna talked about the shortened hunting seasons, and unpredictable ice conditions that didn't allow ice fishing until mid-December last year. "Our hunting seasons are shortening and so is the lifetime

ist Marty Brewer with the DEC concurred, saying that the DEC relies on data from federal agencies and that there is no concern.

The EPA and FDA are the operational lead agencies conducting radiation monitoring.

Shortly after the Fukushima Dai-Ichi explosion on March 11, 2011, the EPA deployed portable gamma ray monitors to Nome and Dutch Harbor. The Nome machine was operational from March 22 to May 17. It was taken down and never redeployed again. The only constant air monitoring sites are in Anchorage, Fairbanks and Juneau.

The Food and Drug Administration tests only commercial foods but not subsistence foods out of the Bering Sea. Theresa Eisenman, FDA spokeswoman, said in an email, "the FDA has no evidence that radionuclides from the Fukushima incident are present in the U.S. food supply at levels that would pose a public health concern." They test FDA-regulated food products imported from Japan and U.S. domestic food products, including seafood caught off the coast of the United States. "Consequently, FDA is not advising consumers to alter their consumption of specific foods imported from Japan or domestically produced foods, including seafood," she wrote.

Since the Fukushima incident occurred, FDA has sampled 1,306 food samples imported to the United States from Japan. "In all of that time we detected trace amounts of Cesium in only two samples — ginger powder in April 2011 and tea bags in August 2013," Eisenman wrote.

NOAA is not monitoring for radiation, but is tracking marine debris sent adrift by the 2011 tsunami, said NOAA spokeswoman Julie Speegle.

Asked about federal funding to beef up monitoring capabilities, Matt with Senator Lisa Murkowski's office said in an email exchange with the Nugget that the best scientific data and research shows no evidence of the least threatening impacts on our waters. "So it is difficult in this fiscal environment to pry loose funding for concerns that are not backed by any scientific data," he wrote, "However, if there was the slightest uptick in threat levels the federal government would seek the most responsible course of action.'

While all testing to date indicates there is no threat to Alaskans' health from contamination from the 2011 nuclear power plant disaster in Japan, Senator Begich remains concerned about continued leakage from the power plant and supports efforts to continue to monitor this.

US Senator Mark Begich's spokeswoman Heather Handyside said that the Senator had repeatedly called on the EPA, NOAA and the FDA to ensure radiation levels are monitored and the risk assessed. Samples were taken of the air, water and seafood. While trace levels of contamination were initially recorded, these were below levels considered a threat to human health and have since fallen.

In short, no subsistence species are being tested for radiation or effects thereof.

Kawerak Inc.'s Subsistence Director Brandon Ahmasuk, also a member of the Ice Seal Committee, said that although radiation concerns were ruled out to explain the mysterious disease that caused skin lesions, hair loss and lethargy in ice seals in 2011, concerns still linger. "There can be arguments made that it is or isn't Fukushima," said Ahmasuk. "Even though we're told there is not enough radiation detected to be concerned about, we don't know. There is no data to back it up."

Dr. Doug Dasher, Research Professor at the Institute of Marine Science at UAF, John Kelley, Gay Sheffield and Raphaela Stimmelmayr developed a poster for the Alaska Marine Science Symposium that hypothesized that the 2011 Fukushima fallout from the air could have had something to do with the unusual morality event of ice seals. Dasher tested muscle tissue from four UME seal samples and concluded that cesium-137 and cesium-34 concentrations did not represent acute or chronic radiological risks to ice-associated seal populations.

Only contaminated food eaten by the seals would have shown up in the tissue sample.

The analysis could not take airborne fallout into account that could have settled on the sea ice. Around 80 percent of the fallout from the nuclear accident was deposited on the ocean, or sea ice, and 62 percent of the air mass trajectories followed a northern route through the Bering and Chukchi Seas. With the sea ice long gone and melted, one will never know if the elevated levels of radiation were present or not.

The authors conclude that knowledge gaps exist on radiation and its effects on molting seals and that they "cannot rule out that increased radiological exposure in combination with a mixture of other contaminants represented an immunotoxic and thyroid gland disease risk during the molt period when the animals were living on the ice."

Dr. Dasher said in an interview with the Nome Nugget that there had been limited funding, capacity, equipment and time to process more than the four tissue samples. However, more samples are still in freezers and could be analyzed in the future.

The danger from airborne fallout from the Dai-Ichi nuclear accident site is over, but since contaminated water continued to seep out of the cooling towers from the Dai-Ichi nuclear plant, attention has turned to the ramifications of ocean currents transporting a plume of radioactive ocean water to the US West Coast

in spring 2014.

Dasher is advocating for a comprehensive approach to monitor for radiation in the waters. "The public concern is valid and needs to be addressed," he said. "We need to gather data in Alaska and not rely on the data coming out of the State of Washington."

The renowned Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution in Cape Cod, Massachusetts, is tackling the funding problem in a unique way. Three weeks ago, WHOI marine chemist Ken Buesseler's launched a crowd-sourcing campaign and citizen science website, "How Radioactive Is Our Ocean."

Buesseler, a senior scientist and a marine radio-chemist at Woods Hole, said in a phone interview with the Nome Nugget that although there no detectable levels of radiation in the ocean water at the west coast, there is no well thought out monitoring going on either.

"There is a disconnect what the government is saying that there are no concerns, but the public is still concerned because of the lack of data," he said.

Through "How Radioactive Is Our Ocean," – and instead of waiting for government agencies to act the public can finance monitoring of radiation in the ocean by donating funds and thereby sponsor the analysis of collected seawater samples. People can also propose new locations and fund the samples and analysis of those sites at Buesseler's lab in Woods Hole, Mass.

Last year, Senator Begich sponsored a Senate staff briefing on Fukushima radiation with Dr. Ken Buesseler. Dr. Buesseler has sampled radiation levels in the water at the reactor site and elsewhere in the ocean. While there were high levels of Cesium in the water near the reactors initially, they have since fallen below levels of concern for human health. He believes these will be further diluted as they spread across the ocean.

Buesseler stressed that he doesn't want to be an alarmist. "I believe the numbers would not be a health concern," he said. However, right now there is no baseline testing being done. "I would like to get the data now before the plume arrives at the coast," he said. The plume of radiation from the Fukushima Dai-ichi nuclear power plant is forecasted to hit the Pacific coast in April 2014, according to a scientific model developed by Spanish scientist Vincent Rossi. Rossi's model projects that traces of Fukushima's radiation will reach Alaska and coastal Canada first because of the trajectory of the Kuroshio Current that flows from Japan across the Pacific. The plume will continue to circulate down the coast of North America and back towards Hawaii.

"We've received a lot of interest from the public so far, which has been great. Right now we're gathering important baseline data, but we need continual support in order to monitor the plume over the long-term," said Buesseler.

So far, the project has received funds from 120 donors donating to 16 locations, none of them in Alaska. Buesseler encouraged Alaskans to sponsor an Alaskan site like Nome and become part of the testing effort. "We should monitor in the Gulf of Alaska and the Bering Sea," he said.

It takes $100 to propose and establish testing at a particular location and to be put up on the website www.ourradioactiveocean.org. On that site, people can donate towards a specific testing location and also view the results. Once a group has sponsored a location, the Woods Hole Institute sends out a test kit. A volunteer then fills a little bucket of water and sends it in a prepaid package to Buesseler. He said it costs $600 per sample to test water for radiation.

Although Buesseler does not expect levels to be dangerously high in the ocean or in seafood as the plume spreads 5,000 miles across the Pacific, he believes this is an evolving situation that demands careful, consistent monitoring to make sure predictions are true.

No traces of Fukushima's cesium-134 have been detected in Buesseler's analyses yet and the levels of cesium-137 have not been at alarming levels, either. "The reason why we see such low levels of radiation in these samples is because the plume is not here yet. But it's coming. And we'll actually be able to see its arrival," Buesseler says. "That baseline data is critical."

Senator Begich said he agrees with Dr. Buesseler that continued monitoring is necessary, but he also said, "funding for such research is difficult to find in this tight budget environment and we spoke about a collaborative scientific effort including government, non-government and academic researchers."

The project currently has sponsors interested in collecting samples from 16 unique locations from San Diego to British Columbia and one in O'ahu, Hawaii. However, none have been proposed yet from Alaska, where the plume is predicted to be detected first.

"Optimally, we'd like to be able to sample and analyze about 20 sites from Alaska to San Diego at regular intervals every few months. We even have had interest from the public as far away as Japan, New Zealand, Guam, and one sailing vessel traveling from Hawaii to Japan this summer, but the West Coast time series is our highest priority," says Buesseler

House Bill 39 raises subsidy for high rural electric bills

By Sandra L. Medearis

Legislators with constituents paying through the nose to turn on the lights are pushing HB39, a measure to increase the state PCE subsidy for high-cost electric energy.

The Power Cost Equalization program directly lowers the cost of electricity for about 60,000 consumers primarily living in rural Alaska where a kilowatt-hour can cost up to a dollar.

HB 39, introduced by Rep. Bryce Edgmon (D-Dillingham), would restore parts of the original program, as it existed before 1999. It would raise the consumption cap on residential power covered by the program from 500 kilowatt-hours to 600 kwh per month, and it would include small-business ratepayers in the pool of entities eligible for PCE, also at a cap of 600 kwh per month. These small commercial customers are clearly defined as only those who presently consume no more than 2,400 kwh per month. Presently, such businesses-which are imporcontributors to bush economies—are not eligible to receive PCE benefits. Rep. Bob Herron (D-Bethel) and Jonathon Kreiss-Tomkins (D-Sitka) are cosponsors.

Under the current program, residential customers of Nome Joint Utility System pay around 38 cents for the first 500 kilowatts on monthly usage. Nome residents pay almost twice that amount for kilowatts used over 500 each month. NJUS has been backing attempts to get the program back to pre-1999 levels of compensation that covered 700 kilowatts of usage per month and also supported small businesses. "Hallelujah! Six hundred kilowatts is better than nothing," John Handeland, NJUS manager said Monday. "We have been advocating for a number of years to return to 700 kilowatts where it was years ago.'

Rural Alaska's geographical location near or above the Arctic Circle. "where the sun don't shine"—that much, joins the high cost of diesel generation to make consumers flinch when they tear open a new electric

"Most of us in rural areas, due to the hours of darkness we experience, use a lot more power. Even plugging in vehicles, necessitated by our extremely cold temperatures, adds to family power costs," Handeland added.

"HB 39 seeks to extend a lifeline to rural Alaskans during the harsh winter months. At the same time, it will support small business owners, strengthening their viability as local job creators and enabling them to make goods and services more affordable in remote communities," Edgmon said in his sponsor state-

The average number of kwh used by Alaska residential ratepayers is almost 700 kwh. Over the United States, the national average shows that most accounts show a use of over 1,000 kilowatts.

The annual range of use dispersed over all the rural communities in Alaska was 330 kwh according to a March 2012 report by the Institute of Social and Economic Research (ISER)

In committee, Rep. Neal Foster pointed out that usage is low in small communities because of high costs. Indeed, research shows that throughout the year, rural residents strive to conserve power and remain below the present 500 kwh ceiling. In fact, on average PCE-eligible customers consume less than 400 kwh per month-more than 40 percent less electricity than the average urban Alaskan consumer. Researchers have described rural electricity consumption as survival-level—scarcely sufficient to power what in urban areas would be regarded as the most basic household functions. In winter, it is particularly difficult to maintain such extraordinary levels of conservation. Utility systems in Western Alaska have been building renewable energy facilities, but small markets and economic conditions have restrained that effort to lower consumer electric prices.

"Unfortunately it will take a lot of time and a whole lot of money to meet state renewable energy goals," Handeland said.

"Small communities not connected to a grid find it financially impossible to meet state goals at this

"We are taking steps to harness renewable energy. That process is ongoing," Handeland said. Significant generation based on renewables is not plausible in rural situations."

The state goal is 50 percent of energy use from renewable sources by 2025. Nevertheless, Handeland has his fingers crossed that HB 39 will move toward realization this session and result in lowered electric bills.

"Unfortunately, in the rural part of the state, the population has grown elsewhere. Our section of representation is not what it used to be," he

The PCE program draws money from an endowment fund started in 2001 with money from major appropriations including the railroad energy fund and the constitutional budget reserve. The fund is required by statute to earn seven percent annually. A rolling three-year average determines the annual endowment fund benefit amount for PCE.

The PCE program was set up for rural Alaska to balance projects designed to lower power costs for less remote parts of Alaska. In the early 1980s, the PCE program came about through trade-offs by urban legislators to secure support of Bush legislators for the hydroelectric projects Susitna Lake and Bradley Lake in the Railbelt and the Four-Dam Pool project in southeast Alaska.

HB currently resides in the House Special Committee on Energy and Finance.

HB 39 addresses the near-term survival of our rural communities. In recent years, the state of Alaska has created and supported energy programs that in time will significantly improve the long-term sustainability of our remote towns and villages. The legislation you have before you is an important interim measure to stabilize those same communities while permanent solutions are established

Throughout the year, rural residents strive to conserve power and remain below the present 500 kWh ceiling. In fact, on average PCE-eligible customers consume less than 400 kWh per month—more than 40 percent less electricity than the average urban Alaskan consumer.

Researchers have described rural electricity consumption as survivallevel-scarcely sufficient to power what in urban areas would be regarded as the most basic household functions. In winter, it is particularly difficult to maintain such extraordinary levels of conservation.

HB 39 seeks to extend a lifeline to rural Alaskans during the harsh winter months. At the same time, it will support small business owners, strengthening their viability as local iob creators and enabling them to make goods and services more affordable in remote communities.

IDEAS-During last Friday's townhall meeting at the Mini Convention Center, Holly Spoth-Torres led through a brain storm session that asked Nomeites to identify what works and what doesn't in the Nome food

transportation is a big issue in food security and safety. This region knows this only too well.

The dependence on imported food becomes painfully clear when weather conditions or other reasons don't allow cargo planes to land in Nome. Also, when the food finally arrives in rural communities beyond Nome, village stores sometimes receive food items not in their intended state: melted ice cream and frozen salad.

In break out sessions Nomeites were asked to identify the strengths, challenges of Nome's food system and then were invited to dream up the perfect solution.

What are the positive things about Nome? On the very top were the possibilities to gather wild foods, pick berries, hunt wild food sources and gather nutritious greens. Many mentioned backyard gardens, modern marvels such as getting foods via Prime shipping on Amazon.com and receiving Full Circle organic foods here at the edge of the Bering Sea. Several people brought up the possibility to help local reindeer herders to grow their herds. For years, reindeer herders have struggled with regulations that limit slaughtering and packaging reindeer for commercial

On top of the list identifying the worries are contaminants that threaten to spoil the environment and hence the wild foods. Contamination from formerly used Air Force sites at St. Lawrence Island, gold mines and increased human activity in the Arctic, as well as bioaccumulation of the world's toxins in the Arctic, the sea and its animals.

People identified the western fast food and soda culture as not working for this area. Also many voiced that a whole generation is losing the knowledge how to catch and process wild foods. In addition, food transportation is expensive, healthy storebought foods are hard to access although it was pointed out that the grocery stores in town carry more and more organic foods. And last but not least: the cost of food is much more expensive due to the added transportation cost.

The meeting organizers asked for ideas and pie-in-the-sky solutions that would overcome many of the challenges we today face in terms of food. One idea was to have a Russian-Alaska exchange of information to better monitor and understand environmental factors. Other ideas revolved around mundane things on how to compost. "It was great to hear that discussion," said Ferguson. "One person said, 'Hey, I have worms to share."

Also, reindeer herding and growing became a center of discussion and with that, Ferguson said, the AFPC can help in terms of looking at policies and regulations to allow reindeer herders to slaughter and sell their locally grown reindeer.

Over the next several months there will be seven town hall meetings to be held in Juneau, Fairbanks, Bethel and other regions yet to be determined.

The AFPC aims to collect the meeting ideas in reports and identify food policy matters to improve the food system. The reports, Ferguson said, will go back to the communities and could serve as a basis for organizations to apply for grants.

On Monday, the AFPC met in Juneau, where several legislators were supposed to attend.

The AFPC's intent is to make recommendations regarding comprehensive policies that improve Alaska's food systems. The council's goal is to assure that Alaskans have access to affordable and healthy, preferably local, food. There are 18 board members on the council, but it also has over 200 members with an interest in improving the Alaska food system.

NOT SO DRY DRY CREEK—An unusual January warm spell caused frozen water bodies such as Dry Creek to melt, making outdoor traveling conditions treacherous.

NVFD provides winter travel and ice safety tips

With the recent warm temperatures the Nome Volunteer Fire Department/Search and Rescue compiled a list of things to consider when venturing into the countryside for hunting, recreating or traveling.

Always tell someone where you are going, how many people you're traveling with, names of other individuals in your group, a date and time when you expect to return, and contact information of someone who may provide us with additional details if needed. The description of your vehicle/ATV used for travel (i.e. color/make/model) is very important, as we need to know what we're looking for. Also add clothing description.

Ice Safety Tips:

Recognize that ice will never be completely safe. Conditions and unseen or unknown factors can render seemingly safe ice suddenly dangerous. Take all care and precautions to avoid mishaps and to put rescue plans into immediate action should something go wrong.

Create an emergency safety plan. If something does go wrong while you are testing or recreating, already have in place the safety procedures that you will carry out for immediate rescue.

For starters, you should be adequately dressed in full cold weather attire. Wear some form of flotation device, even a boating life jacket, especially if you are testing or snow-machining. Carry an ice pick, which can assist in giving you grip should you fall in. Never go without a buddy or two. Tell other people where you and your buddy are and what time you expect to return home. This is not an occasion for casual spontaneity.

Have a spare set of warm dry clothes in a waterproof bag handy. That way you can reduce the risk of hypothermia by changing the wet clothes immediately. Other useful supplies to have as part of an emergency kit include an emergency blanket, hand and foot warmers, thick socks, candles and matches. Pack such emergency items for all winter sports outdoors, even for skating outdoors.

Recognize that determining the safety of ice is dependent on a combination of factors, not on one factor alone. Ice safety is determined by assessing the following factors together:

•Appearance of the ice - its color, exture and features

•Thickness of the ice - there are ent uses

- Flowing water near or at the edges of the ice
- Flowing springs under the ice in spring fed ponds and lakes.
- Water flows in and/or out of the iced-over water body
- Cracks, breaks or holes
- Ice that appears to have thawed and refrozen
- Abnormal surfaces that you have not seen before - e.g., pressure ridges caused by currents or winds

Understand that ice strength is not the same everywhere, not even on the same body of water. The strength of ice is also affected by factors other than color and thickness. Also take into account:

Location of the ice— Is it on a pond, a lake, a stream or is there evident flowing water underneath it? Is there a flow into or out of the water body? This will give cause for concern

Constitution of the water— Is it fresh water or saltwater? Sea ice tends to be weaker and needs greater thickness to support the same weight as fresh water.

External temperature and season— Temperature changes constantly. Beware of microclimates in the local area. Mid-winter ice is bound to be a lot stronger than spring ice, which is subject to rapid thawing and warming bouts of sunshine.

Size and depth of the water body— Larger bodies of water take longer to freeze than smaller ones.

Presence of snow on the ice— Snow can warm up the ice because it acts as an insulator; ice under snow is generally thinner and weaker than ice without snow.

Weight on ice— What are you putting on the ice? Just you or you and a vehicle? There is a big difference in the weight distribution between a body and a snowmachine with said body on top.

City wants land, lotsa land

By Sandra L. Medearis

The City of Nome has stepped up to claim the land lying adjacent to the new power plant along Port Road, eyeing it as a site for expanded port facilities and relocation of NJUS fuel storage tanks.

After many years of planning, U.S. Air Force has declared its tank farm and fuel depot site that has been idle for 10s of years as a white elephant, eligible for surplus.

The Air Force said it wouldn't stand in Nome's way to get the property transferred to ownership and use for economic development. What has to happen?

Environmental issues with fuel residue have slowed the sale. Clean up has to satisfy the federal General Services Administration before they will release the land. Discussions on potential liability are ongoing.

The City could use the six acres to expand Port of Nome facilities and operations, to relocate fuel storage and to help traffic run through port activities more safely.

Southern exposure at the current NJUS utility tank site causes warming which made the ground slough and become unstable.

The City and Port of Nome are hustling to expand and update Port of Nome facilities as receding ice uncovers opportunity for Nome to step into the limelight as either a deepwater port or a transshipment port supporting new resource development and marine transportation infrastructure in Arctic waters. Nome also has a strategic location near the Bering Strait as a center for search and rescue operations and a jump-off place to support ships demonstrating U.S. sovereignty in northern waters.

Because of contamination that several organizations have been working to address, the property, a site of military activities in World War II followed by other industrial uses, has been a no-use zone for 40 years. Various agencies have performed environmental monitoring, remediation and cleanup tasks over the past 10 to 15 years.

The property lies in an area zoned for industrial use, not residential use. Therefore, the City has received support for mitigation of soils where they are, rather than more stringent remediation required for residential use. This means that the fuel-contaminated soil could be capped and

School Board gets prepared for Gov.'s Education Bill

By Kristine McRae

Governor Sean Parnell has introduced an education bill that would increase the Base Student Allocation (BSA) for Alaska's schoolchildren. The BSA is the amount of money per enrolled child each district receives from the State of Alaska. The funding has remained stable for several years, and Parnell's proposal would see an increase, over a three-year period, based on percentage increases in public employee contracts.

Parnell's legislation repeals the Alaska High School Graduation Qualifying Exam, which is currently required for students to receive a high school diploma. In its place, the bill would give students a choice of taking the SAT, ACT, or WorkKeys assessments as a measure of creden-

While the increase in funding is good news for many districts, many proponents of public education disagree with the use of state dollars to fund private, charter and residential schooling, as would be parents' choice with the new system. Last year, Nome's school board came out in opposition to a "voucher" system, which essentially allows the allocated dollars to follow a student, whether they earn their credits through traditional routes or achieve them through college courses or vocational training.

In a statement released January 24, Governor Parnell stated, "No one knows better how to help a student succeed than his or her own family. The measures in this bill will increase opportunity for families to make wise choices regarding their student's education in the public school system; ensure that the essential needs of Alaska's students are met; provide flexibility in assessing achievement and the earning of necessary educational credits to suit an individual student's needs; and incentivize broader opportunities for students as they prepare to enter Alaska's workforce.'

According to Nome School Board President Betsy Brennan, "Education is hot on the burner in the legislature this year." Brennan, along with board member Barb Nickels and superintendent Gast, will travel to Juneau for the legislative fly-in session next week to meet with legislators and discuss the upcoming changes and what they might mean for Nome.

Brennan maintains that, "public education means public," and she indicated that Parnell may be using the education reform platform as a means to sway legislators in other arenas. Supporters of the bill say it would allow parents more choice in where they send their kids to school, but critics worry that it will take money away from public education. In his State of the State address last month, Governor Parnell called on lawmakers to debate the measure and send it to voters, to let them de-

At their work session last week, members of the school board started talks on next year's budget. Each year, districts plan their financial year based on the number of projected students. Paula Coffman, the district's business manager, told the board that the district had planned for 690 students and enrollment has actually reached 711, so that some of the money will need to be recovered from the fund budget. Of the planning process, Gast added, "We don't want to over-predict, though some kids came after the count, but you have to budget for what you think you're going to have in October, so we'll budget for next year at 695."

Following the resignation of both the elementary and high school principals, the board is readying to review applications for potential replacements. "It looks like we're going to have a pool of about 20-25 applicants for each position." Gast told the board. He added that many more applied, but those applicants with no administration experience were excluded from potential inter-

In a discussion about qualifications, Barb Nickels said, "My biggest point for a principal would be to make sure they have at least three years of curriculum and data experience. If they can't read our data, they won't know our kids. It shouldn't be a "preference," but a requirement. With three new curricula being intro at the elementary school, the principal needs that experience." Board members will review the applications to further narrow the pool.

Gast added that he contacted local NEA Board President, Erica Rhodes, to offer representation on the hiring committee. Board member Barb Amarok asked whether a representative from the Native Education Committee would also be involved. "It bothers me that of the 13 or 14 committee members on the hiring committee, only one is an Alaska Native, and the school population is mostly Native," Amarok said. Board member Barb Nickels agreed with the assessment and added, "but most of the faculty and staff are not Alaska Na-

With 30 principal positions open in Alaska, Nome is not alone in their search. Of his experience over the last two years, outgoing elementary principal Bob Grimes said, "I've enjoyed my time here in Nome. It's been a fun and educational experience, and I hope to leave the school in a good shape, in a good way. Members of the board declined to elaborate on the resignations of either Bob Grimes or Scott Handley.

Nome Nanooks pack the Unalakleet Wolfpack at games

By Sarah Miller

The Nanooks met the Unalakleet Wolfpack on its home turf twice over the weekend, winning both games in an exciting and friendly tournament. Unalakleet's team, under the direction of long-time coach Steve Ivanoff, was recovering from two weeks of illness due to the flu and made Nome work for its victories. Ivanoff commented that some of the players were even ill prior to the game on Friday.

The Wolfpack demonstrated their determination not to let the flu slow them down by managing to score 32 of its final 46 points in the first half alone. Nonetheless, the Nanooks stepped up their defense and, with 25 points on the board from Tyler Eide along with 18 from Cass Mattheis, won the game 68-46. Eide also set a school record with 13 steals in this game, and is averaging 4.9 steals per game over the season.

However, by Saturday the Class 2A Wolfpack was ready to even the score, and nearly upset Nome's Class 3A team. Three-pointers by Unalakleet, steals from Eide, and a fast pace kept the game exciting right up until the end. Gage Ivanoff of Unalakleet contributed 16 points, 11 of which he scored in the second half of the game. Klay Baker made some key shots in the fourth quarter, and the Nanooks improved their defense and rebounding over Friday's performance. With 1.9 seconds left to play, the Wolfpack closed the gap with another three-point shot, bringing the score to 44-42 (Nome). A free throw from Alex Gray added one more point to the final score of 45-42.

Callahan commented, "We also did a nice job of running our delay game in a pressure situation at the end of the game."

Ivanoff stated, "I have a lot of respect for Pat Callahan and the way he coaches his team. This weekend was a win-win for both teams. We get to help each other prepare for regionals."

Nome-Beltz Coach Callahan reciprocated in an email, "Steve Ivanoff-coached teams always play hard, play a tough schedule, and improve over the course of the season. It was a real honor to coach against Steve Ivanoff again." Ivanoff was greeted by many Nomeites after Saturday's game, demonstrating the high regard held by each team toward one another and adding a spirit of camaraderie to the competitive ournament.

The Nanooks travel to Kotzebue this weekend for back-to-back games on Friday and Saturday.

Smoker's Dementia: Research links heavy smoking and Alzheimer's disease

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

You may have heard of the smoker's cough, that persistent raspy clearing of tar-stained phlegm heard in longterm smokers, but have you heard about the smoker's dementia?

According research published in the Archives of Internal Medicine, middle-aged heavy smokers are more than twice as likely to develop dementia than non-smokers or smokers who have quit.

The research began in the late 1970s and early 1980s when 21,123 fifty- and sixty-year-old patients from Kaiser Permanente, a California-based healthcare network, were interviewed regarding their smoking person who smokes is at increased risk of developing dementia even if the person has a perfect blood pressure with no sign of diabetes, has a normal cholesterol level, maintains an ideal body weight, eats a healthy diet, and exercises on a regular basis.

The researchers point out that the risk of dementia is likely underestimated in studies like this one because many patients who smoke are more likely to die from other diseases associated with the tobacco use like heart attacks, strokes, pancreatic cancer, and lung cancer. Many patients may have died with dementia, not from dementia, succumbing to some other disease before the end of the study

Here is the good news. Quitting smoking by mid-life reduced the risk of developing dementia. Smokers who quit had the same risk as those who never smoked. Thus the new data presents another powerful reason to stop smoking. Quitting turns out to be a smart way to stay...smart.

• Drug abuse on the increase

nity, but drugs are a hidden danger that lurks in the darkness. The law was defined to make drug use illegal for a number of reasons. The first is that drugs (and alcohol is one of them) can devastate an individual, a family and a community. So let's talk about drugs....

Though alcohol is a 'drug' the drugs I am referring to are different. Drugs like heroin, oxycontin, cocaine, methamphetamine, spice, and a plethora of prescription drugs are in a class of their own. Drugs are habit forming. Eventually, the user will be dependent upon the drug either psychologically, physically, or both. Though this also happens with alcohol, the effects are quite different.

Drugs are powerful. They can dominate the essence of life so that nothing becomes as important as 'getting high'. When a person realizes how deep they're in – they can't get out – because their body and mind won't let them escape. The recreational use they started with consumes who they were and holds them in a vise that will not release. And they will either continue to exist but not really live; or will seek help to overcome their addiction. Few people will escape a life of drug use without help.

The price of drug use is high. Drugs are expensive. Though a jug may cost $20, a single dose of heroin is $200 or more. Illicit prescription drugs can sell for over $100 per tablet. Many times children will go hungry while the drug user services their habit. People steal from each other – even their friends and families –so they can get high. Young people will sell their bodies in exchange for drugs. They will give away who they are to become slaves of their addiction.

So you may ask, "Why would someone want to use drugs?" It all comes down to personal choice and reverts to accountability, decision making, and the modeling behavior they may follow.

It's easy to tell when someone is drunk. But how do you tell if someone is high on drugs? It comes down to observing what is different or abnormal for the person's behavior.

Marijuana – glassy, red eyes; loud talking; disjointed thoughts; inappropriate laughter; sleepiness; the smell of burned marijuana on their clothes or breath.

Depressants (Xanax, Valium, Oxycontin, Hydrocodone, etc.) – contracted pupils, drunk-like behavior, difficulty concentrating, slurred speech, sleepiness. Lack of the odor of alcohol.

Stimulants (cocaine, amphetamines, crystal meth) – dilated pupils, hyperactivity, irritability, anxiety, lack of sleep activity, weight loss.

Heroin – contracted pupils, no response of pupils to light, needle marks, sleepiness or sleeping at odd times, twitching, loss of appetite.

You may think that Nome is a small isolated community, but the fact is that drugs are in Nome; they are being actively sold to people of all age ranges; and the devastating effects transcend age or social status. ALL of the drugs listed above are being sold in this community by people who have no regard for those who choose to buy from them.

The question arises, 'If the police know that drugs are being sold and used – why aren't they doing something about it'. The answer is that the police are constantly working towards making Nome a safe place to live, but there are only so many officers to cover the work that's being done – most of which involves alcohol. Last week there were 47 alcohol related calls and 14 arrests. ALL of them involved alcohol.

Drug use and transactions are conducted in the shadows. Those who sell drugs in your community are careful - they don't want to go to jail and lose the profits they have made by destroying lives. In order to effectively address drugs use, the COMMUNITY will have to get involved and send a message that this is not what they community wants or needs. The COMMUNITY will need to stand together and provide actionable and accurate information to the police to take enforcement action. Rumors and vague information will not help, what is needed are people who are willing to provide evidence.

Nome must decide what they find acceptable. The people will need to decide if they are willing to accept the use of drugs in the community and the consequences to the people around them. Then, action must be taken to change behaviors and hold those responsible accountable for their decisions.

The Police Department exists to exercise the will of the people. Police can only operate with the support and consensus of the community in which they provide services. It is time for the people of Nome to make a decision and promote accountability, decision-making, and role modeling.

If you wish to report drug activity, you are encouraged to call 443-5262. You may provide information by calling and leaving a message on the CRIME LINE 443-8509. IN doing so, you will be making Nome a safer place for all.

Saying it Sincerely

By Rev. Karen Sonray, Our Savior Lutheran Church Member, Nome Ministerial Association

"Let your light so shine before others that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven" Matthew 5: 16

A poster hanging on one of our walls in the church says, "Your talent is God's gift to you. What you do with it is your gift to God." It has hung there for years and is one of my favorites.

Two of the issues young people struggle with the most are a sense of identity and a sense of purpose. I suppose many adults struggle with these issues too

The Christian faith believes we are all children of God, created in God's image. That is our number one identity. Whether we are single or married, Norwegian or Inupiat, young or old—we belong to God. And God sees our worth. God gifts us with talents to nurture and use in the world for the sake of others and for the sake of God. Often we note that Jesus is the light of the world, the light no darkness can overcome. But the scripture quoted above from Matthew emphasizes that that light of God is also carried by us! "This little light of mine, I'm going to let it shine" sing out the children. Eleanor Roosevelt said it another way, "It is better to light a candle than to curse the darkness."

Yet often we have anxiety about our sense of worth and purpose. We don't believe we have any light to share. The Bible tells stories over and over again where God's people struggle with this anxiety. Again and again the response God sends is: "Do not be afraid." It is one of the most common messages in the Bible! "Do not be afraid" to risk sharing your thoughts and your gifts. Do not be afraid what others will think or say. Be more afraid that you will squander your gifts for senseless purposes. Be more afraid that one day you will wake up and wonder where your life went.

There is a concept we hold up in Lutheran tradition called the "priesthood of all believers." This doctrine means every individual has direct access to God without ecclesiastical mediation and each individual shares the responsibility of ministering to the other members of the community of believers. This "priesthood" stems from baptism wherein we become members of God's family.

The Bible passage considered to be the basis of this belief is the First Epistle of Peter, 2:9:

But you are not like that, for you are a chosen people. You are royal priests, a holy nation, God's very own possession. As a result, you can show others the goodness of God, for he called you out of the darkness into his wonderful light.

So, do not be afraid. You are gifted. Nurture your gift. Share it. In so doing, you will discover joy as you live out your identity and purpose given to you by God.

initiated a conversation about school closure policy after the recent bouts of freezing rain and dangerous conditions. She and other members of the board were contacted by parents who questioned the district's policy concerning not only the closure, but also the issue of safety during extremely harsh winds. Superintendent Gast explained that he is working on an appeal to the commissioner about the half-day cancellation, and that the district is required to have a certain amount on student contact hours in order for a day to count as "full." Reader suggested that the district create a policy concerning high winds to relieve any safety concerns, and Gast said he would look into plans that may exist for other districts

Following a recess into executive session, President Betsy Brennan announced that the board had concluded superintendent Gast's evaluation. "Mr. Gast has fulfilled the conditions of his position and he will continue in his existing contract, which goes through June of 2015," Brennan said, "We look forward to working with him in the future."

Soliciting Artists for artwork proposals for the newly renovate Shaktoolik K-12 School. Per State Statute .5% of the Shaktoolik schools remodel budget will be spent on art for the school, this amounts to $36.142. We are asking interested artists to submit art proposals for the school. Shaktoolik is an Inupiat Eskimo community of 250 sitting on the Eastern shore of Norton Sound. Activities like berry picking, hunting land and sea animals along with commercial and subsistence fishing are an important part of daily life. The K-12 schools mascot is the wolverine and the school colors are maroon and gold. Art proposals are not limited to style, medium or size. If interested it is strongly recommended that you contact the school for areas that may fit your ideas. The school can provide you dimensions and photos. A selection committee will award the artwork contracts to the selected artists. For additional information please contact Principal Sammons at (907) 955-3021.

For consideration you will need to submit:

- 2 a dimensional portrayal depicting your proposal
- Written narrative of your proposal
- Portfolio of prior work
- A lump sum cost of your proposal, also a cost breakdown of your proposals budget
- 2 references
- An attempt will be made to return proposals to the artists after a selection has been made.

Board of Game increases bear bag limit

In a Board of Game meeting for the Artic and Western Alaska region last month, the board carried a proposal to change the bag limit of one brown bear every four regulatory years to one bear every regulatory year for Game

The proposal was submitted by Kawerak Inc., Sitnasuak Native Corp., King Island Native Corp. and Nome Eskimo Community in response to increasing reports of brown bears raiding subsistence racks and subsistence camps and even appearing in town. Last summer, two bears were shot within city limits after having been seen multiple times in neighborhoods, going through trash

The Board declined to extend the open season, as the full proposal suggested.

The National Weather Service in Nome reports that the average temperature in January 2014 was 21.3°F, compared to the all-time hottest January on record, set in 1985 at 24.4°F. The normal January temperature is 13°F for high and -3°F for low temps.

Between January 11 and 16, temperatures cooled down to zero and below

As noted in last week's Nome Nugget, January 27 set the all time record temperature of 51°F (old day record: 40°F, 1963) and became the all time warmest winter day on record in Nome.

The warm weather came courtesy of a large high-pressure system off the West Coast, pumping tropical air from Hawaii to Alaska. There was an intense pressure gradient that created record-breaking winds that resulted in average winds blowing at 12.8 mph in January, breaking the January 2011 record of 12.4 mph. This average does not adequately reflect the drama of a wind event on January 17 when sustained winds ripped through the region at 58 mph and gusted at 63 mph, breaking the alltime record of 56 mph wind set in the winter of 2007/2008.

The NWS in Nome reports that this winter was pretty much a "middle of the road" winter in terms of precipitation, but it sure doesn't look like it when taking into account the bare tundra that should be snow covered.

Accumulated snowfall measured 12.2 inches, but again, that doesn't translate what's actually on the ground.

When describing a warm, sunny day in January to the Fairbanks-based Dr. Walsh, he said, "Now, that is not normal." Usually, clear sunny days in January are cold and crisp, not warm and balmy.

As Nomeites bathed in the sun, people in the Midwest again complained about the bitter cold. "It comes back to the breakdown of the jet stream pattern, which has become wavy," explained Walsh. "We've been averaging warmer temperatures in Alaska than in the Midwest and we were warmer than January temperatures indicated for Detroit." The reason is a bend in the polar vortex that transports cold air south instead of keeping the band of cold air flowing around the polar region.

Walsh said this winter would be food for climate studies for years to come. He said he is particularly interested to see if Alaska will recover from the warm spell or if the brown tundra and open, blue water will act as a heat source. This would provide a so-called positive feedback that would keep the weather from cooling, which would add to the warming trend even more. "The key thing to watch is if the ocean refreezes, Walsh said. "If it does, it would cut down on longer term impacts such as storms, and perhaps even impacts on the flow of the jet stream itself."

Just two years ago, January 2012 went into the history books as the second coldest winter on record in Nome. But Walsh predicts that these extreme warm periods that Alaskans just experienced will become more frequent over the next 40 or 50 years.

"What seems to be extremely warm right now is perhaps the average type of winter for in 2070 or 2080," said Walsh. "This may be an early look at what the winters will look like for our grandchildren."

Even if the world cut CO<sub>2</sub> emissions today, we could not reverse or mitigate these wild climate changes, he said. Past generations have already put enough carbon dioxide into the atmosphere to change the climate for the next 30 to 50 years.

IDITAROD TRAIL— Remnants of snow and tripods indicate where the Iditarod Trail should be. Instead, brown tundra shows on the last few miles of trail to Nome.

OPEN WATER— Norton Sound at Farley's Camp shows no shorefast ice and some sea ice floating in vast patches of open water. When ice melts, land or open water takes its place. Both land and open water are less reflective than ice and absorb more solar radiation. This causes more warming, which in turn causes more melting, and this cycle continues. This is known as positive feedback.

Council bans fake marijuana, other dangerous drugs

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council acted Monday to clear dangerous chemicals and herbal mixtures from the shelves with a new law banning sales, use and possession of "Spice" and other synthetic cannabinoids.

The ban became effective as an emergency measure as soon as the ordinance was adopted on Feb. 10.

Violation of the law earns a fine of $500 for use, possession or distribution of synthetic illicit drugs. Each product, package, tube vial or container possessed, used, provided, sold, produced, manufactured, marketed, displayed, offered or advertised means a separate minor offense.

"The substances are a significant safety risk, not only to the users, but those around them," NPD Chief John Papasodora told the Council in a work session. "They can cause permanent psychosis."

Regulation of the substances gives a challenge, Papasodora said. As soon as there is a law on the books, the manufacturers will change the chemical formula of the drug to elude enforcement.

That the substances are not regulated otherwise by state and federal law does not serve as a defense. The prohibition includes substances misbranded "not for human consumption" that are intended or sold with the purpose of being consumed or ingested by humans. Additionally, the law targets substances that are packaged without labels that bear the name and place of business of the manufacturer, repacker or distributor of the finished form of the drug.

That means any substance that is an ingredient of any product that when consumed results in an altered conscious state or an effect similar to using marijuana. This law would cover "Spice" or similar substances under any brand name, or substance that the seller reasonably believes would be consumed that is marked "not for human consumption."

Such substance has a variety of street names, for example: K2, Spice, Black Mamba, Bombay Blue, Fake Weed, Genie, Zohai, Bliss, Blaze, JWH-018, -073, -250, Yukatan Fire, Skunk and Moon

The Nome Police Dept. has verified the availability of these products in Nome.

Councilman Tom Sparks cast a lone no vote against passage of the ordinance, giving the reason that the attorney for the City, Charles Cacciola, had during a work session advised the law was too broad and likely to draw a challenge from civil rights organizations such as Ameri-

Three grownups and two young children, age 2 and 6, attempting to travel in a rented Ford truck from Nome to Teller were rescued twice last week as they encountered treacherous road conditions on Feb

According to Alaska State Trooper Sergeant Charlie Cross, AST was notified by Preston Dixon at 7:55 p.m. on Thursday evening that Rex Iyatunguk, Denise Topkok and their two children, as well as John Saclamana left Nome at 2 p.m. heading to Teller, but didn't arrive by

The troopers notified Teller, but the Teller VPSO was out of town.

Sgt. Cross said Brevig Mission VPSOs Marcus Barr and Jay Olanna wheelers across the bay to Teller and on to the Blodgett Teller Highway. At mile 51 of the Nome-Teller Highway, approximately 20 miles south of Teller, the VPSOs found the Ford truck stuck in a snowdrift and the occupants in good health.

After helping the Nome travelers to get unstuck, the VPSOs went home and the travelers tried to make it back to Nome. This was around 11:07 p.m. When they didn't arrive in Nome by 2 a.m. a relative called the troopers again.

NSEDC board contemplates expanding bulk fuel program

By Diana Haecker

Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation's fourth quarter meetings took place last week in Nome, but unfavorable weather kept a few board members from attending committee meetings held on Wednesday, Feb. 6 in person.

Board chairman Dan Harrelson was weathered in at White Mountain, but arrived the next day.

On the Web:

www.nomenugget.net E-mail:

nugget@nomenugget.com

Weather also kept board members Joe Garnie of Teller and Lillian Olanna of Brevig Mission trapped in their communities until Thursday afternoon, but attended telephonically prior to their arrival. Bad flying weather kept Little Diomede representative Orville Ahkinga from attending at all.

The two-day meeting kicked off with committee reports and several recommendations to be brought to the full board meeting on Thursday.

Finances

NSEDC's Treasurer and Chief Financial Officer Rick Walicki reported on preliminary net assets and liabilities as of December 31, 2013. The preliminary total of net assets and liabilities for the year 2013 are $239.1 million. Net assets came out to $187.3 million and net liabilities are $ 51.8 million. Walicki reported that net liabilities are about the same as last year. The 2012 NSEDC annual report shows net liabilities of $57.9 million, a $6.1 million difference to the 2013 liabilities.

Walicki said the 2013 preliminary numbers mark a gain of $14.8 million over 2012 net assets of $172.5

Walicki said the gain could be chalked up to good investment returns, partly because of royalty income from golden king crab, and some cost savings.

"We had another good year of investment," he said. "We are pleased. Five to six years ago we had bad years, but these past two years we had good fortune," Walicki stated.

In 2012 NSEDC bought KDS Inc., which included a quota share of Aleutian golden king and opilio crab and the crab catcher/processor vessel Patricia Lee. In 2013 the Patricia Lee went online and fished for golden king crab, resulting in increased royalty payments. Opilio royalties showed a slight decrease, but that is more than offset by the golden king crab royalty gain, Walicki said.

Besides revenue gained from crab harvest, cod revenue is also up from 2012, Walicki reported.

"Overall, this was a strong year as far as royalty income," Walicki said.

Cost savings

To the benefit of the bottom line, NSEDC had cost savings last year.

In 2013 the Community Benefit Share paid out to the 15 member communities was $150,000 per community for a total of $2.25 million. In 2012 NSEDC decided to make a special mid-year distribution of $200,000 in addition to the normal yearly distribution for a total of $300,000 per community. This amounted to a total of $4.5 million.

Also, in 2012, NSEDC offered an energy subsidy program for regional residents, which gave a $500 credit to each household at their local utility company. That expense was $1.34 million, not incurred in 2013. Also, there were no fishermen's fairs in 2013, saving NSEDC even more money, said Walicki.

The crab vessel Aleutian No.1, saw significant expenses and repairs in 2012, but not in 2013, remarked Walicki.

Money requests

Southern NSSP manager William "Middy" Johnson asked for a budget amendment to increase funds allocated for the dismantling of the vessel Hawaka. The vessel's freezers and compressors are removed and utilized for parts. Johnson asked for an additional $31,000 as a contingency for equipment rental, operator costs and scrap metal disposal to get rid of Hawaka, bringing up the total cost to $100,000. Dear Editor,

Am I the only parent who took offense to last week's education article in The Nome Nugget? Hearing a board member state that if the new principal "Can't read our data, they won't know our kids" greatly offended me. As a mother of a child in first grade, I'm well aware of the testing requirements and our child's "numbers." My daughter has performed well on testing and is above the national average, however she is not just a "number" to me.

Already, I have seen the effects that these tests have on her. Last Monday her teacher, who is a great teacher by the way, called me after school to let me know that my daughter was stuck on one question and got so upset that she started crying. This is in first grade, she is already this stressed out about testing in first grade? Is there not something wrong here? Our children are not numbers, they are not dots on a graph. I understand the importance of data, but what I want from an administrator is not to see my sevenvear-old as a number. I want him/her to know my child's name, to greet her in the morning, to make her and us, as parents feel welcomed in the school. A new administrator is not going to know our children by reading the data; they will know our children by taking the time and expressing interest in each child in our school, and with our community members outside of school. They will be in the classroom observing the learning process, they will be talking to parents, and they will be making children feel welcomed and safe in our schools.

We have a complete disconnect if our school board is making comments like these. Is this what you want, community? Do you want another new administrator coming in and not knowing our children, or identifying your child with data? As a parent it is not something I want for my child.

I would also like to thank Barb Amarok for publicly making the statement that only one interviewer was Alaska Native when the majority of our student body is Alaska Native. To my dismay a board member thought it was relevant to then add "yes but the majority of our staff is not Alaska Native." How does that justify not having a hiring committee that accurately represents the school population and the commu-

We need to put together a community action group to attack the problem. Some of our users are either so bold or so stupid as to flaunt their use on Facebook. It's time to put our shoulders to the wheel and clean up our act. We have addressed such issues in the past with the Drugs Aren't Wanted in Nome (DAWN) program, but it and others all seem to have gone defunct. We need to express our outrage at the damage drugs have done to our community.

It's time for our civic organizations, non-profits and religious entities to join forces and put the drug dealers out of business. We also need a treatment and rehab program to get folks back to a drug- and

By the way, my seven-year-old 'number" has a name, Mecca. Her Eskimo name is QasuLana. She is funny, hard headed at times, artistic, loves to learn about animals, understands the importance of giving even at her young age, enjoys watching Eskimo Dancing and is sometimes too shy to go out and dance, is kind to her little brother, loves to visit (just ask our neighbor), still likes to cuddle with her parents and loves to swim. #### Poll finds most Alaskans support repeal of oil tax giveaway

"Vote Yes, Repeal the Oil Giveaway" reacted to the latest poll showing a majority of voters support repealing the Oil Giveaway.

In a poll conducted by Public Policy Polling, a majority of respondents support repealing the Oil Giveaway by passing Proposition One.

"Outside companies are spending millions on a misleading ad campaign, but Alaskans know that we need to vote "Yes" on Proposition One and defend our PFDs," said Chancy Croft, who was Senate President when Alaska established the Permanent Fund

Since passage of SB 21, the Oil Giveaway, Alaska has descended into a $3 billion deficit for FY 2014 and FY 2015.

According to the Alaska Legislative Finance Division, this deficit is so large that it creates the threat of cuts to the Permanent Fund Dividend or imposition of an income tax.

"The writing is on the wall: Parnell's Oil Giveaway is a threat to the Permanent Fund. No wonder Alaskans are in favor of repealing the Giveaway by passing Proposition One," said Croft.

Koch brothers close Alaska oil refinery

Alaska candidate for US Congress, Matt Moore issued this statement regarding the closure of the Flint Hills Refinery in North Pole.

"It is puzzling that the Koch brothers have $400 million to spend on political attack ads but don't want to employ 80 Alaskans to produce energy," said Moore.

Moore further stated that Flint Hills knew the contamination existed when they purchased the refinery and since then, the industrial solvent contamination has been discovered far beyond the plant property. Flint Hills is breaking a five-year commitment with the Alaska Department of Natural Resources that was signed less than a year ago.

"Alaska needs value added manufacturing, and diverse industry in our state," said Moore. "We need a congressman that can work on solutions with energy and enthusiasm instead of a representative that plays the blame game."

Koch brothers group admits refinery closure is bad for Alaska

According to the Koch brothersbacked group "Americans for Prosperity", the closure of the Koch brothers-owned Flint Hills Refinery in North Pole "plays a massive role in many foreseeable problems for the interior.'

The admission about the negative effects of the refinery's closure came on the "Americans for Prosperity Alaska" Facebook page, which was created in an attempt to influence Alaska's U.S. Senate race.

"The Koch brothers secret political network is admitting their decision to close the Flint Hills Refinery kills jobs and is bad for Interior Alaska," said Fairbanks resident Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party.

During the last campaign cycle, the Koch Brothers raised $400 million for attack ads and fake "grassroots" organizations designed to influence elections. This cycle, the Kochs are spending money seven times faster, and are dumping money into the "Alaska Chapter" of Americans for Prosperity.

Meanwhile, while laying off Alaskans in the energy industry, the Koch Brothers are investing heavily in an attempt to purchase Alaska's Senate seat.

Gara, French call on governor to concede decreased production

Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) and Senator Hollis French (D-Anchorage) called on the governor to concede his massive oil tax rollback (SB21) will continue a steeper decline in oil production than the  $\bar{l}aw$  it replaced.

"We know the state is giving away billions in Alaska revenue under Governor Parnell's oil giveaway,' said Gara. "The debate on the referendum has to be on facts, not wishes.

During the debate on last year's oil revenue rollback, Governor Parnell repeatedly set the goal of "one million barrels of oil production per day through the Trans Alaska Oil Pipeline System (TAPS) within 10 years" and claimed his tax rollback was the way to get there. At a House Finance Committee meeting on January 28, 2014, Alaska Department of Revenue officials conceded to questions asked by Gara that the department now predicts less production in eight years than before passage of the tax rollback.

According to the Alaska Department of Revenue, Governor Parnell's oil wealth giveaway (SB21, 2013) will fall far short of the governor's goal of North Slope production reaching one million barrels per day. In fact, in the department's first production forecast after passage of SB21, the department actually predicts less oil production eight years from now than it did under the prior oil tax system.

"The Governor led people to believe that giving away billions in Alaska's oil revenue to Exxon, BP, and Conoco, with no guarantee they'd spend that money in Alaska, would lead to a massive increase in oil production. We knew then it wasn't true, and now the state admits it wasn't true," said Gara. Governor is cutting school funding for a fourth year in a row, jeopardizing construction jobs, and harming the economy. His bill is a pathway to poverty.'

Democrats proposed reforms that would have offered tax incentives to companies which increased production and for research to bring our billions of barrels of stranded heavy oil into the pipeline. That bill did not give billions of across-the-board tax breaks to Exxon, BP, and ConocoPhillips, as did SB21.

In the Department of Revenue's Fall 2013 Revenue Sources Book, calculated under the governor's 2013 oil law, the state predicts daily oil production of far less than the governor's goal of a million barrels per day. They project oil production will fall by 33% from 2014 to 2022, from 508,000 barrels per day to 340,000 barrels per day.

How does that compare to their estimates under the previous tax system? The Department's Spring 2013 Revenue Forecast, calculated under the prior oil tax, predicts a smaller decline to 344,500 barrels per day in 2022. See Table A-7, page 26, of the Spring 2013 Revenue Forecast. At projected oil prices, the 4500 barrel per day difference is worth nearly a half a million dollars per day in gross revenue.

"We should adopt an oil tax that actually gets more oil production.

That's the purpose of the August voter referendum to get rid of this costly experiment, which the Department predicts will cost Alaskans $12 billion in lost oil revenue between 2014 and 2022," said French, referring to the Spring 2013 ACES and Fall 2013 SB21 revenue fore-

Republicans acknowledge PFD is at risk

At a recent press conference, House Republicans acknowledged that they might use the Permanent Fund to offset Gov. Parnell's billion dollar deficits.

House Finance Committee cochairman Alan Austerman (R-Kodiak) said, "We are putting everything on the table...we're having conversations about the Perma-knowledged a bleak reality: Gov. Parnell's billion dollar deficits are so large that they endanger our PFDs,' said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party.

Between 2009 and passage of Gov. Parnell's Oil Giveaway, Alaska saved $17 billion for the state's Constitutional and Statutory Budgetary Reserve savings accounts. Following passage of SB 21 Alaska faces $3 billion in deficits over the next 18 months.

Officials in Juneau are debating how quickly Alaska will run out of savings entirely.

The non-partisan Legislative Finance Committee director already testified that the state's deficits threaten the Permanent Fund and raise the specter of an income tax. Statements by House Republicans acknowledge that reality.

Arrest pending in vehicle thefts

By Laurie McNicholas

Three vehicles were stolen Tuesday, Feb. 4 between midnight and 3 a.m. from various locations around town, reports Nome Police Chief John Papasodora.

He said all of them were recovered after they had been abandoned, and all sustained damage by running into things. Interrelated patterns in the thefts have been identified, he

"We know who took one, and we have a pretty good idea who took the other two," Papasodora stated.

He said an arrest is pending as the investigation continues.

The crime is a felony, so the police need to provide the district attorney with enough information to do his job, he explained.

City of Anchorage passed a similar law banning spice and other synthetic cannabinoids on Jan. 23.

The Council unanimously adopted another ordinance repealing certain parts of the Nome Code of Ordinances and re-enacting it to establish penalties and a fine schedule for violations of City ordinances. The measure authorizes enforcement of the laws through issuing of citations and the disposition of citations of minor offences. The revisions harmonize penalty provisions throughout the code and with state law.

During discussion of this ordinance, Councilman Stan Andersen showed himself to be "madder nell" about people stacking honeybuckets-containers of human wastearound their houses. He offered an amendment to the ordinancepassed unanimously-to fine violators $500 per day for improper disposal of honeybuckets.

Nome police tackle heroin use

By Laurie McNicholas

Nome Police Chief John Papasodora described his agency's efforts to combat the local sale and use of heroin in an interview with The Nome Nugget on Feb. 6.

Papasodora's column about local drug use in last week's edition of the Nugget prompted the interview, as did rumors that heroin use is increasing in Nome, involving high school students and that heroin is arriving in Alaska Airlines GoldStreak

Papasodora said heroin has been sold and used in Nome for at least

The police have several pending cases that involve heroin and have submitted evidence in heroin cases to the state Scientific Crime Detection Laboratory for analysis, he

"We have admitted heroin users in the community, and we're constantly gathering intelligence on [them]," Papasodora said. "If the folks out there who are selling

[heroin] think they're doing so without anybody watching, they're wrong. There are people watching. There are people who are talking to the police, and eventually we're going to put those pieces together, and it's going to be a sad day for a lot of folks.'

Papasodora pointed to the head of his pen, about one quarter inch in diameter, to illustrate the size of a salable dose of heroin called a nib and the reason it is so difficult for police to find a nib.

He said heroin users can smoke. inject or swallow the drug.

Asked whether emergency room visits due to drug overdoses or drug withdrawal problems have increased, Papasodora replied: "That's a really difficult question to answer because a lot of times people will come into the emergency room and present an issue that is not related strictly to drug overdose. It can be a problem that is related to a peripheral issue with the use of drugs. though we don't get any notification of that. The hospital works with us very well, but they also know what their limits are legally, which I respect. They make sure they are not violating any patient confidentiality or patient rights when people come in for medical treatment.

"We pick up most of our intelligence if...the ambulance department has to respond to somebody who is having a drug overdose," Papasodora continued. "If somebody presents at the emergency room with a drug overdose, we're less likely to find out about it. We have had incidents at the hospital where they call us and say that a patient has drug paraphernalia, and that's something we look at. It's a very difficult scenario to deal with, because there's no probable cause or legal basis for us to do any searches, but it does give us something to talk to the person, and say, 'What's going on?' If we're successful, and a lot of times we are, the person will tell us what they have stranded party. Cross also requested the help of the Dept. of Transportation and called up DOT Northwest Area Superintendent Evan Booth, who called out operators Peter Hansen and Jarvis Miller.

They went to the shop, prepared the graders, put the proper blades on and were just on their way up the Teller road when they received word that the motorists were found and didn't need the DOT's heavy equipment to proceed back home to

SAR volunteers Sean Octuck and Timmy James found the Ford truck at the bottom of a long, icy hill near the Sinuk River, at mile 25. The occupants were in good health and sleeping when Octuck and James found them, Kosto said. According to SAR officer Paul Kosto, one rescue volunteer was able to drive the Ford truck up the icy hill and the family made it safe to Nome.

Sgt. Cross, Booth and Kosto remind the public that the DOT does not maintain the Nome-Teller Highway, the Nome-Council Highway and the Kougarok Road beyond the posted signs. Even though the lack of snow seems inviting to motorists to travel beyond the big orange signs, icy roads and glaciated conditions are to be expected.

The story has a happy ending because searchers and searched alike returned home unharmed. But DOT superintendent Evan Booth reminds people that decisions like trying to drive to Teller in February are a dangerous proposition. Not only does it place the motorists in danger but also the search and rescue volunteers. In addition there are costs involved. "The DOT northwestern district is not funded to include search and rescues," said Booth. "We do it as cour-

When Booth's phone rang in the middle of the night and troopers asked for assistance, Booth did not hesitate to mobilize all the resources he could as soon as he learned that there are two young children in the stranded vehicle. "When you talk about a two-year-old and a six-yearold out there, the situation warranted to get involved," he said.

Booth also reminds the public that the roads are not maintained beyond the bright orange signs warning motorists. "When people chose to do this haphazardly, they need to know that they put others in danger, too."

In terms of costs, he said a fourhour call out such as this costs the DOT at least $150 per hour per operator and wear and tear on the equipment. "When you put everything together, it's up to $5,000 easily for a call like that," Booth said.

"There is a big orange sign that says we don't maintain the roads year round. Take a look at that and ask yourself what you're doing," Booth said.

If taking the risk to travel in the country, especially when weather conditions are treacherous, experts recommend to take survival gear, extra gas and to bring communication devices such as SPOT GPS or a satellite phone, and to travel with a and where they got it. Sometimes they don't; they execute other strategies to protect their self-interest."

Papasodora said he has not learned of any death in Nome that was clearly related to heroin use. "We have deaths here all the time that can be somewhat unexplained, and usually those deaths come down to creating an amalgam of the person's lifestyle. And a lot of those lifestyle choices lead to premature death, whether it's drug use, alcohol use or a combination of drugs and alcohol. We do have overdoses, and those come into the police department, but usually from prescription medication and not because of heroin...."

Fentanyl-laced heroin deadly

The death of renowned actor Seymour Hoffman from a suspected overdose of heroin Feb. 2 in New York City has prompted a steady stream of reports by news media in metropolitan areas of the United States revealing that heroin use has risen to epidemic levels, in part because it is so inexpensive in large cities. The street price for a bag of heroin in New York City is as little as $6, according to the New York Times edition of Feb. 3. In contrast, Papasodora said a dose of heroin costs $200 in Nome.

Papasodora cited an online report from a Pennsylvania news source attributing at least 19 deaths to heroin laced with fentanyl, a prescription pain medication that is much more powerful than heroin.

"People don't know what they're buying when the buy heroin, and they're shooting the stuff up and it's killing them," Papsadora said. "That's in Pennsylvania; that doesn't mean it can't translate to here. So we have a very significant public safety risk and a health risk to anyone who may choose to use heroin for a recreational drug, and that's what it's being used for. The problem is it's a highly addictive drug, so someone can start out at a very young age using it recreationally and end up being addicted to it for a very long time."

The Baltimore Sun reported on Feb.8 that 37 people in Maryland have died after using the fentanyllaced heroin since September.

Community action needed

The Nome police receive lots of anonymous calls identifying drug dealers, but they need more than anonymous tips to establish probable cause in order to take action, Papasodora noted. "We need real time intelligence that So and So is selling heroin out of their vehicle or out of their house; this is who bought it, this is when they sold it, this is how much it cost-information that can be verified to meet the standards of the law," he explained. He said those who identify drug dealers also need to testify against them in court. "It takes particularly strong individuals to do that, but when that responsibility is spread about a community of people versus an individual, it becomes a much easier burden to carry," he added.

"My point is that as a police agency we're here for public safety," Papasodora continued. "I'm just finishing up the touches on our crime report for 2013. The fact of the matter is the police officers are constantly responding to a variety of issues that consume virtually every bit of time available. So if we're going to effectively respond to this threat—whether it's heroin or prescription OxyContin, whatever else might be out there—there's a lot of it— it's going to take community activity to make it happen."

Staffing deficit overcome

The Nugget asked Papasodora whether the police need more resources to combat the sale and use of illegal drugs, such as a dog trained to sniff out concealed drugs.

"I have an officer who just presented me with a proposal for a canine program, and I'll be talking to the City manager and the City council about that," he replied. "We had a dog here a couple years ago, but we were never able to successfully deploy him for a variety of reasons."

He said the canine can be used to detect drugs at locations such as the airport, post office and schools, and for educational purposes.

"What I'd like to do is get my canine and my canine officer qualified to do D.A.R. E. (Drug Abuse Resistance Education) training in the schools," Papasodora continued.

"It's a very successful program which we haven't been able to implement because of [deficit] staffing. We've been working at almost a 50 percent patrol deficit for the last six months, so I'm just now coming back up to staff."

Papasodora said the patrol deficit has prevented him from filling an authorized investigator position, but he intends to select an officer for the job as soon as possible. "I've got two or three very good officers that are well-suited for that particular position," he noted. He said the investigator will be a liaison with Norton Sound Regional Hospital, mental health professionals, the Child Advocacy Center, district attorney's office, Office of Children's Services and all other agencies with which the Nome police operate on a peripheral level. The investigator will drive those relationships to a central level and will work with other federal and state law enforcement agencies to more successfully address issues that affect the community, he added.

The Nome Police Department achieved full staffing last week when a new officer came aboard, Papasodora noted. He said Sergeant Byron Redburn has returned to the force temporarily to help train recruits and cover significant incidents. He described Redburn as one of the best investigators he's ever worked with and said he plans to fill his position and begin to train his replacement before Redburn leaves.

Retention issues explored

In October of last year Papasodora wrote a 15-page paper, "Hiring and Retention of Police Personnel," that examines staffing issues at the Nome Police Department and recommends strategies for creating and maintaining a highly skilled, competent police force.

"Police officers go through periods of burnout, the most critical ones usually in two and five years," Papasodora told the Nugget. "Two years is when the newness of the job usually wears off, and you start wondering is this really the job I want to do for the rest of my career? Five years is very similar. But during that zero to five-year phase, most police officers experience some level of post-traumatic stress, and that in combination with possibly an unhappy spouse who doesn't want to live in a rural community anymore, possibly [because] you can go some-place else and make more money and be a lot closer to some of the comforts your family may need...or maybe it's to go someplace where a house doesn't cost $300,000. Any number of things can affect some-body's decision-making, the same things that affect anyone else's decision-making when they decide to move from one community to another.

"However, the issue with a police officer is once I hire [one], I'm a year and a half out before they're a contributing member of the law enforcement community," Papasodora continued.

"They can do the basics of the job, but...to have that depth of experience to make the independent decisions to where I don't get 15 calls in the middle of the night asking what to do—that takes a year and a half. We have some newer officers who have been more successful at that than others...., so I'm hoping that the training curve may be less than what I anticipate."

Wood pellets for fuel

NSEDC Community Benefits Director Paul Ivanoff III updated the Finance Committee on the 2013 bulk fuel program, which brought up a discussion that has been circulating in Nome in the recent past. Commentators on the Facebook site Nome Rant questioned why Nome is not part of the program, brought up Board chair Dan Harrelson. When asked why no Nome vendor participates in the program, NSEDC President and CEO Janis Ivanoff said, "I can only imagine they get a better cost on fuel and transport." Nome representative Don Stiles asked if Bonanza Fuel was part of the bulk fuel program in the past. Yes, said Ivanoff, in 2011. Their fuel purchase exceeded the orders of all villages combined.

Stiles asked why fuel prices are higher in Nome than in the smaller communities. Why is that? "It's difficult to compare Nome to the villages," Paul Ivanoff III said. "We don't know what their landed costs

Janis Ivanoff made clear that the bulk fuel program is a loan program, not a grant. The villages pay their way, added Harrelson. It costs NSEDC $4,000 per year to administer the program.

Dan Harrelson said he felt bad that Nome residents pay more for their bulk heating fuel. Stiles suggested expanding the bulk fuel program to include other fuel sources, such as pellets or fuel bricks that can be burned in woodstoves.

The finance committee recommended bringing a motion to the full board to extend the bulk fuel program to vendors of other fuel sources. The motion was passed by the full board.

The investment portfolio performance report was held in executive session, not open to the public.

During the Executive Committee meeting, an executive session dealt with a litigation update. Coming out of the executive session, a motion was made to direct staff to work toward reauthorization of the Magnuson Stevens Act, and where possible, to cooperate with other CDQ groups in this effort. The motion passed.

Siu Alaska

Siu Alaska President John Eckels reported on NSEDC's wholly-owned for profit company. Siu is co-owner of the crab vessel Aleutian No. 1, the crab catcher and processor Patricia Lee and a 50 percent owner of Dutch Harbor Acquisitions, a joint venture with Copper River Seafoods. DHA owns and operates a seafood plant in Dutch Harbor. Siu Alaska also holds a stake in Glacier Fish Company, fishing for the NSEDC pollock share; owns BSAI Partners LLC, a partnership with Coastal Villages Regional Fund, fishing for pollock, and Glacier Bay Fisheries, a freezerlongliner company fishing for cod in the Bering Sea.

Board member Joe Garnie questioned the large investments that were done in 2012 to the Aleutian No. 1 after significant repairing and overhaul costs were incurred. Garnie asked if the partners in the vessel share or match NSEDC's investments in the vessel. NSEDC also carried a $3.7 million loan guarantee for its partners when NSEDC sold the vessel to Siu. The Aleutian No. 1 is owned by Siu Alaska, the vessel's two boat captains and Ed Poulsen. Siu Alaska gifted the Bering Sea Women's Group with a 25 percent holding stake in the Aleutian No. 1, but BSWG sold it.

According to Eckels, the new ownership configuration is as follows: Ed Poulsen owns 19 percent, the two captains Rick Alvarez and Rip Carlton, operating under BAT LLC, own 31 percent and the rest is owned by Siu Alaska.

Garnie requested a breakdown of the Patricia Lee and Aleutian No. 1 expenses, losses and profits.

Rick Walicki stepped in and said he didn't have the detailed numbers at his fingertips right then.

Garnie said he'd like to have a better understanding of the financial picture and wanted to know to what percentage the other owners invest and reap returns.

Janis Ivanoff asked that the board be provided with such information.

Eckels said that fishing is good this year, all Glacier Fish Company boats are out fishing pollock, the fish are reportedly optimal in size at this time, which allows for more weight per hook and faster fishing.

Eckels also updated the board on a new investment in Bering Select Seafoods Company. Without going into details, he said the ownership structure is not yet worked out, but under the current structure, Siu would be a 20 percent owner.

The product, Eckels said, would be a supplement in form of a superior quality cod liver oil in capsule form. "This is primo stuff," Eckels said. "This is the only oil in the world produced by liver frozen at

The rancid taste associated with cod liver oil comes from old livers processed on land. This liver is pure, frozen within an hour of catching the fish. Eckels said.

However, it is still not known who the other partners are and to what percentage they would participate in Bering Select Seafoods products are harvested by freezer longliners owned by their affiliate, Clipper Seafoods, Ltd., as well as freezer longliners owned by independent companies. These fishing vessels offload the frozen product at Dutch Harbor. According to the Clipper Seafoods Ltd. website, Clipper operates seven freezer longliners in the Bering Sea and Gulf of Alaska, harvesting Alaska cod, sablefish and Greenland turbot.

In its shareholder meeting, the Siu board elected Crystal Booth to fill an at-large-seat left vacant when Harvey Sookiayak won the Shaktoolik election to represent his community on the NSEDC board. No NSEDC board member, committee member or employee can fill an at-large seat on the Siu Alaska board.

Jason Evans and Joel Cladouhous also filed letters of intent for the seat. Crystal Booth had nine votes; nominee Jason Evans received five votes. The term ends November 2014.

issues. Three proposals regarding shellfish are submitted to the Board of Fish and will be discussed in their upcoming meeting, said ADF&G fish biologist Scott Kent. One is to list the Hanasaki crab – a species that arguably expanded its range from its home at Hokkaido, Japan to the northern Bering Sea - as a commercial red king crab species. Kent explained that Hanasaki crab are now showing up regularly in crab pots of local fishermen and the listing may lead to a sustainable harvest and hence sale. The first Hanasaki crab was documented in 2003, when a subsistence fisherman found the spiney crab in his pot at Little Diomede.

Currently, Hanasaki crabs are listed under miscellaneous shellfish and cannot be commercially harvested.

Another proposal would make hand-lines legal gear for commercial crabbers. In a winter when unstable ice conditions are not conducive to set crab pots, handlines may be a good option that is less expensive and less risky to loose in unstable ice conditions, is the argument.

ADF&G Research biologist Jenefer Bell reported on two crab research projects.

A crab tagging project funded by the North Pacific Research Board tracked movements of crabs tagged at a five-mile and 10-mile transect. The researchers expected equal recovery crabs from transects, but found that more crab tagged at the 10-mile point were caught in commercial fishermen's pots. "Crab closer to shore don't seem to move out that soon. We thought they all move out at the same time," Bell said. The researchers deduct that not all crab move equally fast to the commercial closure line, which lies about 15 miles offshore.

Due to frugal spending, the researchers plan to conduct a third year of tagging this upcoming summer. "This will either add to the confusion or clarify it," Bell said.

The second project was a pot survey to assess molting process and to find timing of the molting. The researchers used knuckle color and the shell hardness as indicators to determine if they're close to molting. Bell said that she wasn't sure if a pot survey is the best way to gather the data since crabs don't feed during the molt. Also, knuckle color and shell hardness are subjective criteria and Bell concluded that taking blood samples for hormone levels may be the better way to obtain more reliable data.

Charlie Lean updated the board on the slow progress of the regional planning team, tasked to update a salmon plan that would outline enhancement projects to ensure plentiful salmon runs in the region. The regional planning team is made up of

Wilma Osborne arrested, held on new assault charges

By Sandra L. Medearis

A month after Magistrate Judge Brooke Alowa dismissed three misdemeanor charges against Nome resident Wilma L. Osborne, Osborne has incurred three new misdemeanor charges on assault and resisting arrest.

She has pleaded innocent to these charges filed earlier this month.

On Monday, Osborne was in Anchorage undergoing psychiatric treatment at the Alaska Psychiatric Institute.

Until Saturday, Osborne remained at Anvil Mountain Correctional Center pending $10,000 bail and appointment of a third party custodian.

Superior Court Judge Tim Dooley signed a temporary order Feb. 7 clearing the way to release Osborne and send her to API for treatment with a special transport team.

According to Dooley's temporary order, Osborne must return to court following treatment to face the later charges.

A peremptory challenge by the district attorney disqualified Alowa from presiding over Osborne's cases.

Superior Court Judge Tom Dooley took over on Feb. 6.

A peremptory challenge in this case means that defense and prosecution have the right to one change of judge by simply filing a notice to the court without stating any reason.

Between August and January, the court released Osborne several times on bail, but Osborne had to return to AMCC after violating conditions of release.

In December, a mental health evaluation found Osborne incompetent to aid in her defense and in need of mental health treatment.

In a January 3 hearing, Alowa stated that Osborne had served more time in jail than she would have served if she had been convicted on the charges.

Based on case law, Alowa ruled, this meant continued incarceration would deny Osborne's right to due process.

Alowa held Osborne for another week before she dismissed charges to give parties the chance to have her committed for mental health treatment

Osborne did go to Anchorage, but was released after a short time.

Before August, Osborne had no criminal record, according to State of Alaska court records.

Osborne went back to jail because of new charges relating to an incident on Feb. 3 at the Osborne home when, according to a charging document, Osborne committed domestic violence against her husband.

Osborne then resisted arrest by responding police officers. During the confrontation, Osborne told officers to leave the home, that they had no right to be there. During her resistance to removal, Osborne kicked NPD Officer Nicholas Harvey in the groin, according to court documents.

On Feb. 4, Osborne pleaded innocent to two counts of Fourth Degree Assault—recklessly causing injury to another person, and a third charge, resisting personal arrest by force.

Osborne stated she would hire her own attorney for defense. A representational hearing was slated for Feb. 11 to discuss the defense attorney issue.

On Feb. 4, Assistant District Attorney Tom Jamgochian, exercised a peremptory challenge to disqualify Magistrate Alowa from presiding over the new cases.

On Feb. 6, the courts assigned Judge Tim Dooley to preside.

The original misdemeanor charges resulted from incidents in the last week of August when Osborne entered Anvil Science Academy and hit teacher Todd Hindman.

She was arrested and release on bail, but returned to the Nome-Beltz complex school grounds against court orders.

During a string of court hearings following the August charges, Osborne's legal counsel, Richard Gilmore, has argued that Osborne needed psychiatric treatment and not continued incarceration in isolation at AMCC that, Gilmore said, exacerbated Osborne's current condition.

As of Friday, Feb. 7, Osborne had no legal council for the new charges.

If defendants needing mental health care go to prison in the Bush, some might say the cards are stacked against them. Unlike urban jails in Alaska, rural jails do not have mental health professionals on staff, not even part-time.

AMCC inmates are served by a contract between State of Alaska and Norton Sound Regional Hospital for behavioral health services. They may also speak with a mental health professional via telemedicine.

Court records show that Osborne was to meet with a clinician from BHS on Feb. 4. However, the contract with BHS provides one-time service in crisis situations and not ongoing periodic counseling.

When persons are in custody of the State of Alaska, the state picks up the payment for physical and mental health services, whether or not the person is Alaska Native or a nonbeneficiary of Indian Health Service

Assistant District Attorney Tom Jamgochian at court hearings, on the August charges, has argued that Osborne has violated state laws, and following the finding that Osborne could become competent with medication, should remain in jail or treatment facility and be forced to take medication allowing her to return to competency to face charges.

Hindman, the teacher assaulted in August, sought and received a protective order through the court against Osborne last month when Osborne was released by Magistrate Judge Alowa.

ADF&G representatives and members of an ADF&G recognized regional aquaculture association, in this case the Northern Bering Sea Regional Aquaculture Association.

The Alaska Legislature last year authorized $100,000 per year, for three years, to work on the salmon plan until it is completed. "There will be more planning and more studies," said Lean. In a recent meeting of the NoBSRAA, little planning was done as the most discussions had to do with bylaws and administrative things, said Lean.

Scholarships

The Scholarship Committee postponed the election of a chairman until the next meeting when all committee members would be present.

Jerry Ivanoff reported that NSEDC supported five students with $10,000 in the last quarter. A total of five scholarship recipients in the fourth quarter received $2,000. NSEDC awarded 387 scholarships for the year for a total of $721,723. For 2014 the limit per student/per semester was increased to $2,250.

A question came up if students still get the care packages, which happened in the past when Kawerak, NSHC, Bering Strait Foundation and NSEDC partnered up to make care packages and send them to students who study out of the region. The full board directed staff to look into restarting the care package program.

Bylaws Committee

The only item on the Bylaws Committee meeting concerned the question whether to expand the compensation committee from four to six members. The committee meets only once a year and the full board has discussed in the past the wish for more inclusion. NSEDC General Counsel Kyan Olanna outlined three options and recommended that committee ask the board for approval to change the bylaws governing the compensation committee by adding two more people to the committee. The recommendation carried and full board took action to approve.

New hires

An additional fishery biologist for Nome was hired. It is Ashley Brown, a former ADF&G employee, who will start to work for NSEDC on February 18.

John Baker of Nome was hired as a special projects coordinator to provide technical guidance and to coordinate construction or installation projects. The position for the Northern NSSP operations manager is still advertised, with Josh Osborne acting as the Nome plant operations manager.

The board also decided to change the Norton Sound Seafood Products structure to have one operations manager oversee both plants in Nome and Unalakleet and to recruit for one more biologist for Unalakleet

Wales clinic improvements

Community Benefits Director Paul Ivanoff approached the board with a request from Wales for $330,000 to help complete renovations for the Wales health clinic. The City of Wales, the Alaska Native Health Consortium and Norton Sound Health Corporation pitched in to upgrade the clinic with renovations, but funds were needed to finish the project. A motion to grant the $330,000 for to complete the Wales clinic carried.

By Sarah Miller

The Nanooks defeated Kotzebue's boys and girls teams in all games this At home, the Lady weekend. Nanooks hosted the tournament while celebrating Senior Night on Friday. Ashley Tobuk, Sarah Clark, Adelaine Ahmasuk, Ariana Horner, and Tamaira Tocktoo were the seniors recognized, along with team manager Katrina Jepson. Ahmasuk and Horner each had a big night, scoring 18 and 16 points respectively, along with 10 points added by Senora Ahmasuk.

The Lady Nanooks dominated the game in scoring despite the contribution of Kotzebue's Danielle Field, who put up 19 points in the game. The final score in Friday's game was 51-40, Nome. The first half of Saturday's game was somewhat closer, but by the end Nome pulled ahead and claimed victory, 53-31. Horner was the lead scorer in this game, with 20 points, followed closely by Senora Ahmasuk with 19 points. MarySue Hyatt, Serena Williams, and Tiffany Avery led Kotzebue's team in scoring. In Kotzebue, the Nanooks took the opportunity to sharpen its defensive play against a well-coached team, according to coach Pat Callahan who commented in an email. "Kotzebue is a very well-coached team, so it was a great test for our defense to see what adjustments a wellcoached team makes against our primary defense."

Callahan identified the key defensive players on Nome's team as Briar Dickson, Matt Tunley and Eli John-

Offensively, the Nanooks demonstrated their strength as well. Tyler Eide scored a total of 36 points combined (15 in Friday's game, and 21 on Saturday). Klay Baker's weekend total was 30 points, shooting 7 out of 8 from the 3-point range, and he was a major contributor for rebounds and steals in Friday's game. Alex Gray supplied 15 points over the weekend, followed by Cass Mattheis with 14 and Daniel Head with 11. Matt Tunley put up 11 on Friday night alone, along with 6 rebounds and 4 steals. Eide not only put points on scoreboard, he provided a total of 10 rebounds, 21 assists, and 10 steals in the two games; overall, a great weekend for the Nanooks. Callahan also noted that the team was able to reconnect with two former teammates in Kotzebue - Dempsey Woods Jr., now playing for the Huskies, and his sister Hailey who is a cheerleader for Kotzebue. "It was great to see two former Nanooks participating in Kotzebue," stated Callahan.

Next on the sports calendar, the varsity teams travel to Valdez for the Elks Tournament, where the boys' team will play its first against Seward and the girls will meet Skyview on the court. Following that, teams from all around Norton Sound will convene here in Nome for the Norton Sound Shootout on February 20-22. The JV teams will play against Brevig Mission's girls team, the Shishmaref boys team, and both teams from Gambell and Chevak. Barrow's varsity team will play against the Nanooks as well, although the games will not count in tournament standings.

St. Michael Hosts Poetry Out Loud

By Jessica Petersen

Master of the Ceremony: Wilfred Otten

The 4th annual Poetry Out Loud competition for Bering Strait School District was held in Saint Michael on January 10, 2014. Students from Wales, Gambell, Stebbins, Elim, Koyuk, Unalakleet and Saint Michael participated. Poetry Out Loud is sponsored by the National Endowment for the Arts and the Poetry Foundation.

This event encourages students to explore poetry. Students who participated in this event have the opportunity to increase their public speaking abilities, recitation skills, and memory all while building their self-confidence.

The event was coordinated by Theresa Davis of Unalakleet. Judges included Mary Long, Pauline Richardson, Bobbi Andrews, Tammy Dodd, Jill McCauley, and Jessie Petersen. The Master of the Ceremony was Saint Michael's very own, Wilfred Otten, who kept the crowd entertained all night.

Saint Michael community members and students came out to enjoy in the festivities. At the end of the event, 3rd place was given to Evelyn Oxereok of Koyuk, 2nd place was given to Lovina Steve of Stebbins, and 1st place was awarded to Angela Nashalook of Unalakleet. Thank you all who participated, coached, coordinated, and supported!

Blanche Lockwood of Saint Michael makes her community proud by participating in Poetry Out Loud.

Distance Learning Takes Off!

By Cheri Yocum Unalakleet Guidance Counselor

Distance Learning: Who is doing it now?

The Bering Strait School District has launched its first virtual classroom.

The first course being taught from the virtual classroom is Introduction To Career Pathways. Students meet four times a week to explore careers using the state sponsored website www.akcis.org as well as teacher directed activities and on-line communication with classmates. Forums are used for discussions as well as the VTC for visual classroom presentations.

The advantages to distance learning include:

- The opportunity to study subjects not offered on site
- Flexibility of scheduling
- Improves students' technology skills
- Allows students time to think, create, and respond
- Gives students the chance to connect with other students in the district
- Improves communication skills

Distance learning is fun and innovating! This is just the beginning! The possibilities for education are limitless.

Spring Is Blooming With Student Opportunities

By Kathy Commack Northwest Campus

Annie Weyiouanna giving a presentation at Savoonga school.

Spring semester has officially started at Northwest Campus! Can you believe the school year is already half over? BSSD and NWC are continuing to collaborate to offer high school juniors and seniors an opportunity to earn college credit while still in high school. At BSSD's request, NWC schedules the dualcredit courses during the school day during the 2:00 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. period.

This past fall semester, 25 students from 7 sites across the district enrolled into two different NWC dualcredit classes. Many of those same students have continued on by enrolling into English 111X, a freshman college class this spring semester. College Success Skills is also offered this spring. With the support of local teachers, principals and parents,

In the postsecondary world, spring semester is also known as "FAFSA season". The FAFSA is the Free Application for Federal Student Aid. Students must file the FAFSA every year to earn scholarships, grants, work study programs, and loans to help pay for college and career school tuition and fees. NWC advisors Kathy Commack and Annie Weyiouanna work with district counselors to offer numerous FAFSA events across the district. Events have taken place in White Mountain, Golovin, Elim, Savoonga, Unalakleet and Shishmaref. Stay tuned for upcoming events across the district in other sites.

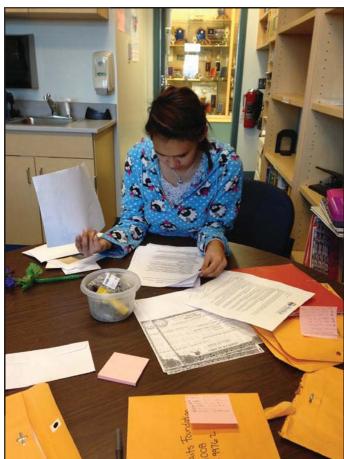

Kathy Commack explaining to the students at Koyuk school the benefits that Northwest Campus offers.

Northwest Campus also participated in the biannual Kawerak Career Fair, hosted at the Savoonga and Koyuk schools at the end of January. NWC along with various local, regional, and state agencies participated to provide education and career opportunities for junior high and high school students. The Career Fair is scheduled again for the end of April at sites across the district. To learn more about these opportunities, please contact a Northwest Campus advisor or your local principal.

What Are You Going to Do Once You Graduate?

By Laura Leadingham

Shana Shoogukwruk is working hard on her CACHE scholarship form. She graduated this December and is now enrolled at Alaska Christian College. Shana started her classes in January.

This could possibly be the most dreaded question for any 18 year-old that doesn't have an answer. Our students tend to be busy year round between family, school, athletics, and community activities. However, this time of year is especially important for our 2014 seniors. They are not only juggling the usual activities, but also contemplating life-altering decisions. This year many of our students have been working hard to complete university and technical school applications, filing the FAFSA (Free Application for Federal Student Aid), and working on scholarship applications to fund their post-high school education.

How can you help our seniors? Give them a listening ear, provide opportunities and support, and remember that transitioning to adulthood takes time. What I hope our students realize is that it is okay if they change their minds, and right now the sky is the limit. Success comes to those who work hard, have patience, and plan for the future. As a first year counselor in BSSD, I have been amazed at all of the support I've seen for our kids. Let's keep it up and help our students finish the school year strong!

Tuff Blood Thru Tough Times

By Lennea Picnalook Brevig Mission

It was a beautiful morning. The sun was rising up. Mooriaq was amazed by the beautiful view while he was drinking fresh water from the lake. The view made him think of hunting. Just thinking of hunting made him so motivated. As Mooriaq drank some more fresh water from the lake, he thought of how delicious and juicy oogruk was. A cold breeze blew into his face. He sighed and remembered water was coming up soon. Mooriaq admitted he was desperate to store up food for winter, so he decided to make plans for hunting.

"Ublalurituq babe. What are you doing up so early?" Tummasaq said as she walked out of the tent.

"Making a schedule for my hunting season...to store up food for the winter," signed Mooriaq.

"Don't stress too much about it. I know we'll have enough food," she declared in a cheerful way, as she changed the subject, "What do you want for breakfast?"

"Okay," she gave him a kiss. "You want to get the food out for me please?" she asked.

While Mooriaq was getting the food out, she got the pottery pans out. Cling, cling! "Here bap. Should I go wake up mom?" he questioned.

"Yea, breakfast is almost finished." said Tummasag.

"Mmmmm, smells yummy." remarked Aqatima as she walked out of the tent to get a sip of fresh water. She paused to drink a cup of water. Aqatima was a young elder, age 54. She was Mooriaq's mother. She asked Mooriaq, "Son aren't you going to hunt today?"

"Yeah, I need to pack up my gear," he grinned widely.
"Breakfast is ready!" Tummasaq shouted. Everyone's mouths were full of watery saliva from smelling breakfast. The three of them ate so greedily their food was all over their faces. When they were all done, Mooriaq decided to pack up his hunting gear and dressed up appropriately for hunting. "Have fun babe! Come home before it gets dark," Tummasaq said in a worried way.

"Yeah, Don't worry, you should know I'm an amazing hunter," he bragged. She smiled and kissed him goodbye.

"Whew, I wonder who those two hunters were?" He squinted and saw the two hunters walking towards him. He thought, "Who could they be?" As they were walking towards him, he made sure he didn't lose the two caribou he had caught.

"Hi! We watched you catch those caribou," the stranger said. "My name name is Quinaq and this is my brother Nonuk."

"I'm Mooriaq. Where did you two come from?"

"We came from up the lake. We live up there," Nonuk replied.

"I live down by the lake. My mother and wife are down there. Do you want to meet them?" Mooriaq asked.

"SURE!" both of them said loudly.

"Okay, just let me cut up these two caribou first," said Mooriaq.

"Let me help you," Quinaq commented.

One hour later they were finally done cutting up the caribou. They started to head down towards Mooriaq's campsite. As they were heading down, Mooriaq could easily see his campsite. "That's our campsite. See down there?" Mooriaq told Quinaq and Nonuk.

"Yea, I see it," both of them replied.

When they got there, Mooriaq introduce them to his wife and mother, "Mom, Babe, these are Quinaq and Nonuk. We met each other while we were hunting."

"Nice to meet you. Welcome to our campsite," Aqatima smiled.

"You two are welcome to our campsite anytime," Tummasaq smiled.

"Thanks, nice to meet you ladies," Nonuk said as the two hunters shook their hands.

"You caught two caribou!" Aqatima was so surprised. "Yea," Mooriaq grinned.

Later that day the five of them ate, having an excellent time. After dinner they are ahpiks for dessert. It was getting late so Mooriaq asked, "Is it alright if the both of them stay for the night?"

"Of course it's okay," Aqatima answered quickly. The two of them thanked Aqatima.

"Well it's getting late. I think I'm going to get ready for bed," Tummasaq said.

"Me too. Just let me get some things you two need for bed," Agatima commented.

"Okay, thanks again," Quinaq replied. After everything was settled down the five of them went to bed.

It was in the middle of the night. The lake was filled with glitter from the moonlight, and gentle waves were sliding up onto the shore. The campsite was filled with peaceful breathing.

As the sun was slowly rising up, the campsite became silent. Suddenly silence filled the whole campsite. "Huh, huh, huh, huh," some animal breathed as it marched. Mooriaq awoke. He felt something bad. Chills came up on him and a fearful tingle attached his heart. He peeked his head out of the tent. His eyes got wide when he looked at a humongous brown bear across the lake. He gasped and quickly grabbed Aqtima's and Tummasaq's shoulders. "THERE IS A BEAR ACROSS THE LAKE and it's HEADED OUR WAY!" he whispered fearfully. The two of them work up worriedly.

"Really?" they spoke as they peeked their heads out to check.

"Where's Quinaq and Nonuk?" Tummasaq asked quickly.

"Get ready. We're going to head to the canoe. I'll try my best to get the guys. Just get ready and head back." Mooriaq declared. As the two ladies were sneaking their way out, Mooriaq quietly got to the guys tent. He work up the Quinaq and Nonuk and told there there was a bear across the lake. Quinaq and Nonuk woke up wide eyed, "For real you're not joking?" the both of them gasped.

"Get dressed. We're going to meet with Aqatima and Tummasaq behind out campsite," Mooriaq said as he was getting the paddles.

When Quinaq and Nonuk were all dressed, the three guys snuck out of the tent. They met with Aqatimi and Tummasaq just as the bear turned their way. "GO IN THE CANOE! THE BEAR JUST SPOTTED US!" Mooriaq said worriedly as he was pushing the canoe out. "Huh, huh, huh," breathed the bear. It smelt their fear. It started to run after them.

"Push! Push!" Quinag yelled.

"It's coming after us!" Agatima cried.

As the bear got closer and closer it reached out for the canoe. Mooriaq jumped in and they just made it out onto the water. "What are we going to do now?" Aqatima sobbed. "We don't have food to eat!" she sobbed even harder.

"It's not time to worry about that. We will check out our campsite tomorrow," Mooriaq said.

"Then where are we heading now?" Tummasaq asked.

"We could stay at our place for tonight. It's just up the stream,"  $\mbox{\it Quinaq}$  answered.

"Do we have enough room for the five of us?" Aqatima asked.

"Yeah we should have," Quinaq replied.

When they arrived, everyone pulled the canoe out of the lake. "That's our cabin right there. We should all fit in it for tonight." Nonuk told them.

"Okay," Aqatima sighed.

It's getting late we better make a fire before it gets too late," Mooriaq told everyone. Soon the fire was going and everyone made sure they got everything ready in case something else was coming. The got ready for bed.

The next day everyone woke up and got dressed. "What should we do first? Should we head back down to our campsite and check it out?" Tummasaq asked.

"Yea, we should pack up the canoe first," Quinaq said. After they finished packing all their gear, everyone headed down to the canoe.

A half hour later they reached Mooriaq's campsite. "Just looks like the fish rack got damaged!" Aqatima cried for joy. When they reached land Aqatima ran to the tent and observed for broken damages.

"Just the fish rack got damaged!" she cried happily. "Really?!" Mooriag gasped.

"Yeah!" Aqatima said. Everyone hugged each other with tears of joy.

"We stuck with each other even through rough times," Mooriaq smiled.

"I couldn't be more blessed," Tummasaq smiled.

The five of them remained and lived with each other. They stayed together as a family for years, and their lives were filled with happiness

I, the Superintendent of Bering Strait School District and the Governing School Board would like to take this opportunity to spotlight the individuals who have received honor roll recognition for the first quarter. The individuals who are listed here are meeting the consistently high expectations held in their classrooms and achieving above and beyond. Achieving academic success of this caliber is a reflection of a network of multiple supports. The district would like to acknowledge and thank the supporting parents, community members, affiliated organizations, and especially the teachers and principals in each school for working extremely hard as an advocate for precision and brilliance. Keep up the outstanding work!

Respectfully, Superintendent Brett Agenbroad

Events in Shaktoolik!

By Emily Bena and Lynda Bekoalok

Shaktoolik students work on an airplane project.

This week our ECE students are learning all about different forms of transportation. They talked about how everyone got to and from school and how it changed from summer to fall to winter. Students understood that walking or riding bikes in the summer worked because of the weather. Then when it got colder they rode on a honda or a snow machine. The students also shared their ideas about different ways to go between the villages. How does your family go from Shaktoolik to Unalakleet? Boat? Plane? Snow machine? Honda?

The class even had a 2-foot car constructed of cardboard boxes. The boys and girls enjoyed using tools to "fix" the car before driving it. There was lots of creative ideas about what type of vehicle this was. They read some great poetry and learned about how our bodies can be a mode of transportation too. Our feet can take us from here to there!

Seth Paniptchuk works hard to build his airplane.

The middle school students (6th-7th Grade) of Shaktoolik made Cell Cakes this week. It was lots of fun, and tasty too! Animal Cell & Plant Cell. Can you name the parts?? Cell Membrane? Cell Wall? Mitochondria?

Shaktoolik students displaying their Cell Cake.

Cassie Smith instructs the students on the best ways to build their own airplane.

Another group of Shaktoolik students proudly display their Cell Cake.

2nd-3rd Grade: In Social Studies last month we learned about parts of the globes. We used blow up globes to learn about hemispheres and the seven continents. During our reading buddy time with the K/1 class we painted our feet and made a foot book. Then on Veterans Day we said the Pledge of Allegiance over the VHF and thanked the veterans of Shaktoolik for their service.

Events in Koyuk!

By Pamala Potter

Koyuk was excited to have Superintendent Brett Agenbroad come visit all of their classrooms!

Darla Grediagin, BSSD Librarian, gave the whole student body wonderful books for Christmas. Thank you Darla!

The district office donated a big screen television and a blu-ray DVD player for Koyuk's attendance awards.

Ashley Hoogendorn and Adam Prentice won two mini iPads for their perfect attendance.

Koyuk student Ashley Hoogendorn was excited to win BSSD's 17th Annual Spelling Bee.

Our dear custodian for many years in Koyuk retired: Allen Kimoktoak and his son Steven.

We had the black and gold invitational at Koyuk. Great times!

Two speakers from the Nome Community Center spoke to every grade about not smoking.

Wonderful presentations!

I Know I Can!

By Jessica Petersen St. Michael

A display of the future class of 2024 in St. Michael.

Saint Michael 2nd grade students participated in the "I Know I Can" Event in conjunction with UAF-NorthWest Campus and the Alaska Commission on Post-secondary Education [ACPE] .

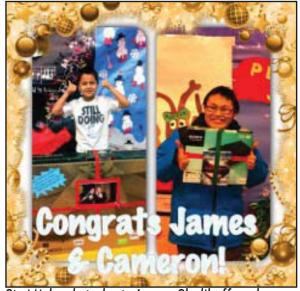

"I KNOW I CAN" is a program targeted for 2nd grade elementary students and their families to start thinking about college early. Mayor Bobbi Andrews read the book, "I KNOW I CAN" to the students, and they also received a copy of the book to take home. Students discussed careers and college. On a postcard, students drew their own goals/dreams in life. ACPE will mail the postcards back to the students after a few years to remind the students of their goals.

A 2nd grade student drawing a picture of what they want to be when they grow up.

It's was a fun and exciting way to teach the endless opportunities beyond high school to our young, impressionable youth.

We are so proud of our students!

St. Michael students James Shelikoff and Cameron Niksik win a TV and Blu Ray prize during the perfect attendance prize drawing.

A Few Good Men

By Gary Eckenweiler
BSSD Facilities/ Maintenance Director

Some of the damage done by the electrical fire.

"A few good men, " likely saved Stebbins school from total fire destruction. On the night of Jan. 14, 2014, Christopher Masters (BSSD Carpenter from Unalakleet), William Soonagrook (BSSD Carpenter from Gambell), Joe Gadjdosilc (BSSD Painter from Unalakleet), Tyrone Towarak (Carpenter Helper from Unalakleet), and Hermes Dan (Stebbins Maintenance) stopped a fire that had all the potential of total destruction.

Fortunately, the stars were lined up in our favor that night. An electrical fire started in the wall behind an exterior electrical junction/light box. The fire started undetected, was burning and gaining strength and had all the potential of becoming fully out of control

Firewall.

On a typical late night the building would be empty, but due to a construction project some of the BSSD Maintenance crew were staying in the schools apartment on the opposite side of the building. Here's where the stars lined up. The crew opened the school apartments window and caught a whiff of smoke from outside, no alarms had sounded, but the guys investigated anyway. A chain of events took place that led to the fire's detection and extinguishing by the guys mentioned. Looking at how the event played out, a number of things happened and fell into place. If you remove one of these the results would most likely have been catastrophic.

Our guys shined and their dedication to the facilities is obvious. For instance they could have smelled the smoke from outside and assumed it was from the village, or lingered, before investigating. Looking back, the fire had taken hold, was starting to gain strength and was headed to the rafters when the guys found it and started extinguishing it. They worked as a team using every available fire extinguisher to stop it. Stebbins has seen their school lost by fire before. It's more than just rebuilding after a complete loss due to fire. Education is severely disrupted and the threat of losing life is very real. These men deserve applause for there actions. We, in the maintenance department specifically, thank them for their care and dedication.

HELPFUL HINTS FOR FILLING OUT YOUR INDIAN EXEMPTION PAPERWORK

The Indian Status Exemption paperwork that releases Alaska Native and American Indian people from Affordable Care Act requirements is now available. Please complete this document to avoid a tax penalty!

IMPORTANT NOTE: If you are applying for the Indian Status Exemption, you have the entire year of 2014 to submit this application. However, we suggest that you complete the exemption paperwork and mail it no later than October 1, 2014, to ensure that the federal government has enough time to process your application. We encourage you to do this as soon as possible to avoid any delays.

Helpful hints to complete the Indian Status Exemption application:

- 1) Print out exemption application at:
  - http://marketplace.cms.gov/getofficialresources/publications-and-articles/tribal-exemption.pdf
- Print an extra copy of the "Step 2" page from the application for your spouse, and each of your children or others in your family who are Alaska Native and/or American Indian. You will need to complete a separate "Step 2" page for each member of your family you claim on your taxes.
- 2) What to include with your exemption application:
- A copy of one of the following for each person you are filing for;
  - Tribal Enrollment Card or Letter
  - Proof of ANCSA (Regional or Village) Shareholder Status
  - Certificate of Indian Blood (CIB) Card issued by the Bureau of Indian Affairs
- If you don't have one of the items above, you can also visit your local Tribal clinic for a "Letter of Eligibility to Receive Care"
- Send copies only. Do not send original cards or documents. These items will not be returned.
- 3) Here is a document that provides additional instructions and helpful hints: http://anthctoday.org/aca/Indian_Status_Exemption.pdf
- 4) Keep a photocopy of the entire application and forms for your personal records.
- 5) What happens next?
- You will receive an Exemption Certificate Number from the Health Insurance Marketplace that you'll put on your federal Income tax return.
  - This is for your 2014 taxes that you will file in 2015.
  - Keep this certificate number in a safe place as it is how you will avoid the tax penalty.
- If you don't receive the certificate information, call the Health Insurance Marketplace Help Center at 1/800-318-2596.

NSHC Patient Benefits will be traveling to our surrounding villages to assist with the Tribal exemption.

Give your Valentine heart healthy chocolate

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

If you want to express your love toward your sweetheart, you could send a card or flowers. But if you really care about your Valentine's heart and brain, go for dark chocolates.

Research shows that chocolate in moderation improves overall cardiovascular health by lowering blood pressure, reducing inflammation, moderating platelet activity, and lowering harmful blood fats.

Dark chocolate has a low glycemic index, meaning that its effect on blood sugar is lower than would be expected for a "sweet" dessert-type food. Research also suggests that chocolate has a positive insulin-like effect that helps regulate blood sugar.

Eating chocolate even appears to lower your risk of having a stroke. Studies show that people who eat at least 50 grams (about ½ chocolate bar) per week are less likely to have a stroke compared to people who do not eat chocolate.

Chocolate also seems to help patients who have had a heart attack. In a study published in the Journal

Dear Editor,

To keep our cultures we must support people who are educated. If we don't, our youth will have no incentive to go beyond high school. High school education is the steppingstone. Going to school is expensive and time consuming. I was fired for missing one meeting in my work career. In fact the first time I noticed the door was opened only for me to be fired. UAF had a teacher-training program to train Native people to become teachers, which makes sense.

Today we don't have a program to train our teachers. I appreciated David Bowling and Joe Braack for their support.

Education was always a community effort in the Native world.

İt's like Republicans against Obama. Now they are saying healthcare reduces employment or allows people to stop working now that they have health care. Remember we pay for our health care.

This also allows others to find a job. Someone has to take their place. Our representatives should not be jealous of their shareholders. Yet we keep electing the same people. Once I ran for the AEC board. The principal was happy a retired teacher was running. We both were disappointed I came in tenth place out of 10 peoof Internal Medicine in September of 2009, patients who ate chocolate two or more times a week had a 66 percent reduced risk of dying from a subsequent heart attack compared to patients who did not eat chocolate.

The health benefits of chocolate stem from naturally occurring compounds called flavonoids. In addition to chocolate, flavonoids are found in many plants and plant-derived foods such as blueberries, cranberries, apples, peanuts, onions, tea, DOCTOR and red wine. There are more than 4,000 different flavonoid compounds. The active compound in chocolate appears to be a powerful flavonoid called epicatechin that has insulin-mimicking effects, reduces vessel-damaging inflammation, and promotes heart health.

According to a study published in the journal Circulation in 2007, the heart-protective benefits of the flavonoids in dark chocolate appear within two hours of consumption.

Not all chocolate has the same benefit. Cocoa is the healthy flavonoid-rich ingredient in choco-Therefore dark chocolate, which has a higher cocoa concentration, is considered more beneficial than milk chocolate, which has a higher proportion of sugar and saturated fats. Furthermore, dark chocolate is processed in a way that preserves up to 95 percent of the flavonoid content.

Despite the heart healthy effects of dark chocolate, eating chocolate should not take the place of daily exercise, a nutritious diet, and taking medication as prescribed.

Eating dark chocolate in moderate amounts seems to have heart-healthy effects. So when choosing a gift for your Valentine, consider a box of heart-healthy dark chocolates or a dark chocolate bar. It will demonstrate your love in a way that is both delicious and nutritious.

Lenore Duling Fuller (Lee Fuller)

Lenore Duling Fuller, Wasilla, Alaska passed away peacefully with her loving family at her side on January 28, at Kauai Care Center in Kauai, Hawaii.

A Military funeral will be held later in the spring at Fort Richardson National Cemetery where her husband, John G. Fuller is laid to rest.

Lenore "Lee" Fuller was born August 4, 1918 in Plainfield, Ohio daughter of Clyde and Lenora Derr

Duling. During the height of WWII she enlisted in the Woman Army Corps (WAC). She graduated from the Army Occupational Therapy School on Staten Island, New York and served at McGuire Hospital, Richmond, Virginia and Letterman Hospital, San Francisco, where she was honorably discharged at the end of the war.

She attended Muskingum College, New Concord, Ohio and is a graduate of Adrian College, Adrian Michigan with a Bachelors of Arts Degree in Elementary Education. She did additional work at Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio. She and her husband came to Alaska in 1964 to teach in the Bureau of Indian Affairs Schools at Point Hope and Gambell on St. Lawrence Island. She later taught in the Nome School System. Lee taught school for over 20 years. She is a member of Christ First United Methodist Church in Wasilla and a long time active member of Beta Sigma Phi Sorority. After her family, painting, writing and reading have been her favorite activ-

Lee is survived by two daughters, CDR Abigail Fuller, retired Navy of San Antonio, Texas and Johnalee Fuller-Otten of Kauai, Hawaii, sonin-law David Otten, grandson Justin Isco Totten, grand daughter-in-law Jamie Totten, and great-granddaughter, Saige Lenora Totten of Alaska; sisters, Lucy Dale Kent and Mary Lee Legge, of Ohio; godsons, Lee Fuller and Luke Adams and goddaughter, Ella Lee Lisbourne. She was preceded in death by her husband John G. Fuller of 65 years, sister Reva Catherine Bruns and brother Clyde V. Duling, Jr.

In lieu of flowers the family suggests donations be made to her favorite charity Covenant House Alaska, 755 A St, Anchorage, Alaska 99501. The ceremony will be announced in the spring, the family can contacted iwojimajack@gmail.com or PO Box 779, Eleele, HI 96705

Former Nome resident dies from fall

Jeannie Rose Waltz, 52, lost her life in Mexico earlier this month. Waltz was on a trip south of the border for dental treatment with husband Ken Waltz, when she fell and hit her head, according to friends.

She lapsed into a coma lasting several days and then died on Feb. 4.

Jeannie and Ken Waltz moved to the San Francisco area several months ago where Ken Waltz took a job teaching political science at the college level.

Jeannie was the daughter of Margaret Olanna of Nome.

Saying it Sincerely

A Different Way to Look at Things By Rev Ross Tozzi, St. Joseph Catholic Church Member of Nome Ministerial Society

Recently, millions of people tuned their TVs to the Super Bowl to watch the Broncos and the Seahawks compete. Seattle fans cheered at every touchdown and every turnover but the Denver fans had little to cheer about. Time after time, as they tried to mount an offense the Broncos lost the ball to an interception or a fumble. The biblical salt that lost its flavor was trampled underfoot (Matt. 5:13). At the end of 60 minutes of regulation play the score was 43-8 in one of the most lopsided games in the history of the Super Bowl. It was a chance to gloat for the Seattle Seahawks, and an embarrassment for the Denver Broncos . . . a clear winner and a clear loser. Competition is like that, joy for the victor and sadness for the vanquished.

God offers us a different way to look at things, a win-win situation for both. We are all created equal in the eyes of God and we are all in the game together. There are numerous ways we can cooperate and work together, helping one another, so that we can all be winners.

You are the salt of the earth, the light of the world. When we share our bread with the hungry, we help to balance the inequality so that no one goes hungry. When we shelter the homeless; when we as a community offer a place of rest from the cold like the Nome Emergency Shelter, no one freezes to death on the streets of Nome. When we take time to listen to people and offer a sympathetic ear, their burden seems a little lighter. When we empower people to solve their own problems, everyone is a winner and the world is a brighter place. When we help others feel wanted and appreciated, we in turn grow in our capacity to love and to sacrifice for the good of others. When we work for justice, we have the opportunity for true and lasting peace. "Then your light shall break forth like the dawn, and your wound shall quickly be healed." (Isa. 58:8a)

Jesus suffered death on the cross to wipe away the sting of death, to break the bonds of sin, and to offer salvation to all. Jesus has the power not only to heal but also to transform us so that our crosses, our struggles, our pains, and failures in life become bright lamps that we can proudly place on a lamp stand for all to see. We shine the lamp not to boast of our own power, but to help others see that playing a game where all are winners is the best way to help our communities and give glory to our heavenly Father.

Postal Service to reverse large package rate jump for rural Alaska

The committee's bill would allow the Postal Service to begin to ship alcohol. Begich said he amended the bill to ensure the service respects state, local and tribal laws when shipping alcohol. Alaska's Local Option Law allows communities to regulate or prohibit the importation, sale and consumption of alcohol.

Most Bering Strait communities are

"dry" by local option, legally banning the purchase, sale or importation of alcohol. A few villages in the region are "damp," allowing alcohol to be imported for personal use subject to local restrictions. The region's only "wet" community is

Nome, where adults may legally buy alcohol from commercial sources.

By Laurie McNicholas

A 50 percent parcel post rate increase for packages heavier than 50 pounds that took effect Jan. 26 will be reversed for shipments to rural Alaska communities that are inaccessible by road, according to Sen. Mark Begich. He said he met with Postmaster General Patrick Donahoe on Feb. 6, and Donahoe told him the Postal Service will undo the rate increase for rural Alaska as soon as this

Earlier that day the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee on which Begich serves passed the Postal Reform Act to the whole Senate and House of Representatives. Begich said the bill includes his amendment to freeze rates at last year's level while the Postal Regulatory Commission studies whether the Postal Service has a monopoly on package shipments in rural areas. He said a lot of Alaskans who felt blindsided when the Postal Service jacked rates on large packages had complained to him.

The bill that cleared the committee fully protects the Bypass mail program, Begich noted. He said Donahoe told him the Postal Service will add flights between Togiak and Quinhagak to speed up Bypass mail Begich also amended the bill to protect the right to have firearms in post office parking lots.

Preserving rural post offices

Begich said the proposed legislation includes an amendment introduced by Sen. Claire McCaskill to impose a one-year moratorium on the closure of any rural post office, station or branch. The amendment would require the Postal Service to allow for public meetings of customers to discuss possible changes, and it would allow the elimination of a post office only if the Postal Service determines that

- The decision would not limit customers' access to essential items and other timely deliveries:
- Communities would be unlikely to experience any unexpected loss;
- The area served by the post office has adequate access to broadband Internet service;
- There is another post office within 10 miles of driving distance.

Processing rural mail

Begich said he convinced Donahoe to allow the Ketchikan Post Office to process Ketchikan area mail in Ketchikan. Currently mail originating in and destined for Ketchikan ership throughout his career at NMS, and his experience in both operations and strategic planning is an invaluable asset to our company," said David Springgate, president of NMS.

"Eric has earned this opportunity through his professional accomplishments and commitment to customer service excellence. His commitment is sent to Juneau for processing and then back to Ketchikan.

The Nome Post office deals with similar problems. For example, mail such as letters, packages or bundles of newspapers originating in Nome and destined for Teller are sent to Anchorage for processing and then to Teller. A letter originating in Nome and to be sent to Nome must be sent to Anchorage for sorting and then back to Nome.

USPS financial status

Begich said the proposed legislation is designed to place the Postal Service on a solid financial base, and his amendments will not affect that goal. He said he will work closely with Rep. Don Young to protect amendments for Alaska when the bill moves from the Senate to the House of Representatives.

This report was compiled from a telephonic press conference Begich conducted Feb. 6 and two press releases he issued on the same day.

Big Game guide pleads guilty to violations

A big game guiding business owner pleaded guilty on Jan. 24 to multiple guiding violations stemming from a series of hunts in different parts of Alaska in 2010. Michael C. Vanning, 45, of Verdale, WA entered into a plea agreement with the Department of Law, Office of Special Prosecution, for multiple misdemeanor charges that had been filed separately in Kotzebue, Fort Yukon, Fairbanks and Sand Point courts over two years. Vanning pleaded guilty to multiple registered guide-outfitter related offenses including wanton waste by a guide, fail to salvage game and failure to supervise and participate in contracted hunts with clients and assistant guides in the Fort Yukon and Kotzebue cases.

In the agreement, Vanning's registered guide-outfitter license is permanently revoked. Vanning was also fined $90,000 with $80,000 suspended, and placed on probation for 10 years where Vanning is prohibited from hunting, guiding or outfitting. Vanning's hunting privileges were revoked for a total of 12 years from the combined charges. The state agreed to dismiss the Sand Point and

Fairbanks cases accusing him of guiding a hunt on private land, failing to report a violation and possessing or transporting illegal taken game in return for guilty pleas in the Yukon and Kotzebue Vanning owned Gateway Guiding Inc. and had operated sheep hunts in the Brooks Range, brown bear hunts in Western Alaska and moose hunts near the Seward Peninsula. This is Vanning's third guiderelated sentence. The first was in 1998 when Vanning was charged with guiding outside his use area and

Soliciting Artists for artwork proposals for the newly renovate Shaktoolik K-12 School. Per State Statute .5% of the Shaktoolik schools remodel budget will be spent on art for the school, this amounts to $36.142. We are asking interested artists to submit art proposals for the school. Shaktoolik is an Inupiat Eskimo community of 250 sitting on the Eastern shore of Norton Sound. Activities like berry picking, hunting land and sea animals along with commercial and subsistence fishing are an important part of daily life. The K-12 schools mascot is the wolverine and the school colors are maroon and gold. Art proposals are not limited to style, medium or size. If interested it is strongly recommended that you contact the school for areas that may fit your ideas. The school can provide you dimensions and photos. A selection committee will award the artwork contracts to the selected artists. For additional information please contact Principal Sammons at (907) 955-3021.

For consideration you will need to submit:

- 2 a dimensional portrayal depicting your proposal
- Written narrative of your proposal
- Portfolio of prior work
- A lump sum cost of your proposal, also a cost breakdown of your proposals budget
- 2 references
- An attempt will be made to return proposals to the artists after a selection has been made.

Proposals need to be submitted by Feb 15, 2014 to:

PUBLIC NOTICE

In addition to the provisions in the following ordinance, the Nome Common Council recently approved a $100.00 fine (per occurrence) for failing to keep sidewalks shoveled and sanded. Therefore, if your property abuts a sidewalk, you must take every precaution to ensure that the sidewalk is safe for pedestrians. Various local contractors, such as Bering Straits Development Company, provide this service if you are unable to do it yourself. If you have any questions, you may contact the City Clerk's Office at 102 Division Street or at 443-6603.

16.15.010 Snow removal.

(a) No person having the care, either as owner or occupant, of any premises bordered by a sidewalk, shall fail to remove any snow which may have fallen thereon, within a reasonable time thereafter.

(b) In the event that a person mentioned in the preceding subsection shall fail to keep the sidewalks adjoining his or her property reasonably clear of snow, the city may cause the snow to be removed from such sidewalk and assess the cost thereof against such premises at the rate of three dollars per front foot; such assessment shall be a paramount lien upon the premises against which it is assessed and may be collected and enforced as general taxes are collected and enforced and be subject to the same penalties and interest after delinquency as in the case of general taxes.

(c) A person whose snow has been so removed shall be mailed, by registered mail, a notice in writing by the city clerk, stating the time of removal and the cost of removal. Said notice shall state that if the owner does not appear and in writing object to said charge, the same shall be immediately assessed against his property by motion properly carried at the next ensuing council meeting. The lien shall attach from the date of passage of said motion and the same shall thereupon be entered on the assessment rolls of the city. No such motion shall be made within ten days of the mailing of said notice. (Ord. O-93-6-6 § 1 (part), 1994) placed on probation for two years. The second was in 2007 for multiple violations related to a client taking a sublegal sheep, use of a non-commercial pilot for hunter transporting and guiding outside Vanning's use area. In April of 2011, Vanning's registered guide-outfitter license was revoked for two years and his plane, a PA-18 Supercub, was forfeited.

Vanning's father, Michael H. Vanning, 65, worked for the business as a guide. He has a history of illegally hunting sublegal sheep and altering their horns to make them appear legal. In January 2011, he paid a $2,500 fine and his registered guide outfitter license was revoked.

"Girls Read" program features award-winning graphic novel

By Laurie McNicholas

Lizzy Hahn was among a group of fourth grade girls who heard a lively reading of "Flora and Ulysses: The Illuminated Adventures" while eating lunch Friday in the Nome Elementary School library. The graphic novel is about comic book fan Flora Belle Buckman and Ulysses, a poetry-writing, super hero flying squirrel

"It's just fun to be there and have the grown-ups read to you," Lizzy said. "It's a good little read." The readers were Danielle Slingsby, executive director of Nome Community Center, and Megan Timm, CAMP prevention program, Norton Sound Health Corp.

NES Librarian Nancy Bahnke used a projector to display graphic art from the novel on a screen.

"Flora and Ulysses" author Kate DiCamillo won the 2014 Newberry Medal for the most distinguished contribution to American literature for children.

The book was selected for the reading prior to the award, noted Kegoayah Kozga Librarian Marguerite LaRiviere. She said the "Girls Read, Guys Read" program now in its fifth year in Nome is cosponsored by NES, Nome Eskimo Community, the Nome Literacy Council and Kegoayah Kozga library. The program is conducted each school year in two sessions of six to eight weeks for fourth graders—a session for girls with adult women as volunteer readers and a session for boys with adult men as readers, she added.

"Boys' test scores in reading tend to drop in the fourth grade," LaRiviere noted. "From kindergarten through third grade students learn to read, and from fourth grade up they read to learn." Students who can't read at grade level can't comprehend subject matter in math and science textbooks written for their grade level, she added. "What we want to do is offer them good quality books and see what develops."

LaRiviere said the Fairbanks North Star Borough School District and the Fairbanks Literacy Council created a program for men from the community to read graphic novels comic books structured as chapter books-to fourth grade boys as graphic art from the books is projected onto a screen. The sessions are held during the students' lunch period in school libraries to avoid any loss of instructional time. The Nome program for fourth graders is based on the Fairbanks model but includes a session for girls as required by Nome Public Schools, LaRiviere

The 20-minute readings don't reach the conclusion of a graphic novel, and students eagerly seek copies to finish reading it, LeRiviere said. "There are 24 fourth grade girls in the program and only five circulating copies of each book, so we pick five names from a hat, and when the books are returned they go to the next children on the list," she added

"I was one of the lucky ones who was chosen, and I have 'Flora and Ulysses' in my backpack," Lizzy said. "I thought it was just a marvelous book, and since I am still reading it, I don't know how it's going to end, and I think it's going to end well."

The current "Girls Read" program concluded with the reading of "Flora and Ulysses".

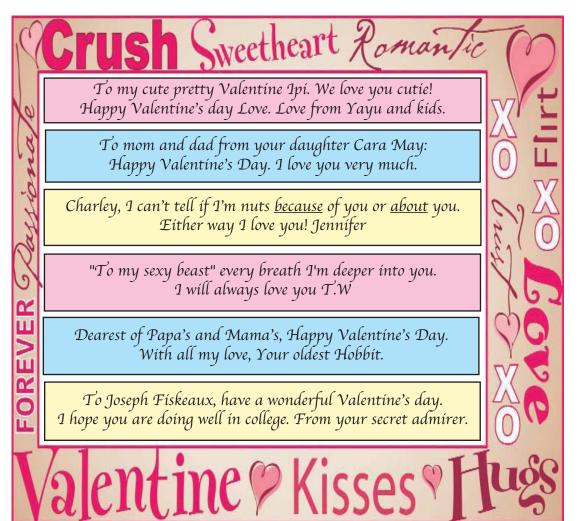

A party for participating girls and their guests is scheduled Feb. 12 at 2:30 p.m. in the NES library. Each student will receive a chapter book, the title of which will be a surprise, LaRiviere said.

NSHC has new concept for Wellness and Training Center

New capital investments planned in Nome and region to shrink operational costs in the long run

Bv Diana Haecker

The use of the old Norton Sound hospital to house a substance abuse treatment center, dubbed Wellness Center, has been scrapped for good.

However, plans are afoot to construct a new building that would be home to the Wellness Center and also provide space for a Health Aide and EMS Training Center and other of-

NSHC CEO and President Angie

Gorn said in a recent interview with The Nome Nugget the idea to renovate the old hospital and turn it into a Wellness Center did not pan out because of the high cost associated with the remodeling. The cost amounted to an estimated $18 million. For that price tag, NSHC envisions to build a new building on property owned by NSHC across Greg Kruschek Ave., which is closer to the new hospital. The cost of renovating the old hospital building for only one intended use does not make sense, Gorn said. However, to construct a new building that would house three programs and lead to a decrease in operating costs over the long term does make sense.

As for the fate of the old hospital, which was advertised for sale, Gorn said that NSHC received an offer and the parties are now entering into the second phase of negotiations.

Wellness and Training Center

The new Wellness and Training Center building would serve multiple purposes. According to a preliminary floor plan diagram, it would house Behavioral Health Services and the Wellness Center on the first floor, including a separate area for an intake section and a detox area. The second floor would be occupied by the Public Health Nursing clinic, Health Aide Training and EMS training rooms including mock laboratories and mock exam rooms.

The Anchorage architectural firm Bettisworth North worked on a preliminary design. NSHC officials have asked the State Legislature to include in the Fiscal Year 2015 capital budget a request for $1.2 million for planning and design of the Wellness and Training Center. It also re-

City reworks overdue spending policy

By Sandra L. Medearis

The City of Nome administration has been working to catch up on getting a procurement policy.

A procurement policy is a set of rules for buying services and goods by transparent and competitive transactions to exercise fiduciary responsibility over public money.

Unlike most cities of size in Alaska, the City has been operating without such a written policy. However, many projects funded by state and federal money demand competitive bidding and a Request for Pro-

A new procurement law under consideration seems to head in the right direction, but contains sections where it also seems its own teeth, allowing sole source procurement and limited competition procurement, putting the burden back on public officials and an alert public to deny favoritism to the Good Ol' Boys and Girls Club.

Nome has had a policy on the books, signed by Mayor Robert Renshaw 40 years ago, but the policy essentially says "put it in writing" as regards completion date, liability and price.

That current policy does not address competition necessary to get the best price for spending the public's money.

"The last policy was written in 1973 and basically said, 'if you want something, go buy it." Not the best, or most transparent method for fair stewardship of the public's money," Councilman Matt Culley said Mon-

Despite fire scare Morgan/Olds lead Iron Dog racers out of McGrath and into Nome

Mike Morgan's Polaris Switchback snowmachine after arriving in Mc-Grath on Sunday evening, as they raced toward Nome from Big Lake in the Iron Dog Snowmobile Race.

Evan Booth described the scene as a scary looking ball of fire.

"It looked real bad," said Booth. Morgan quickly put the gas cap back on. His father Stan Morgan and trail support Evan Booth ran into the checkpoint to get a fire extinguisher, which was found and put to use.

The reason for the fire was that the snowmachine was still too hot

But what looked bad ended well. The fire burned the gauntlets and the intake filter, but the parts were changed out and the Nome/Eagle River pair continued up the trail on Monday at 11:07 a.m. after having taken their 14-hour layover at Mc-Grath, a combination of a mandatory six- and eight-hour layover.

They were the first in and out of the checkpoint.

Up until McGrath, team Tyler Aklestad and Tyson Johnson had a fiveminute trail time lead on the Nome/Eagle River team.

However, Aklestad and Johnson had to content with mechanicals and needed to do some welding in Mc-Grath before they could leave the checkpoint and chase Morgan and

Bill Introduced to Allow Firearms on University of Alaska Campuses

Senate Bill 176 allows law-abiding citizens to exercise their Second Amendment Rights

Senator John Coghill (R-Fairbanks/North Pole) introduced Senate Bill 176, with the urging of Legislative Intern Hans Rodvik from the University of Alaska Anchorage, to ensure that law-abiding Alaskans are able to exercise their individual, constitutional right to keep and bear arms at University of Alaska campuses.

Article 1, Section 19 of the Constitution of the State of Alaska guarantees the individual right to keep and bear arms. The right shall not be infringed or denied by the State or a political subdivision of the State. Current state law does not prohibit law abiding citizens from carrying concealed firearms on UA Campuses.

However, since 1995, University of Alaska administrative policy has prohibited the otherwise lawful concealed carry of a handgun on or in university offices, classrooms, buildings, and at university sponsored events not on uni-

"The Alaska Constitution affords us many rights, including the right to carry a firearm," said Senator Coghill. "Individuals do not lose the right to bear a concealed firearm simply because they enter a public university.'

"With Senate Bill 176, we aim to continue defending the liberties of Alaskans," Senator Coghill continued.

SB 176 is now headed to the Senate Judiciary Committee for further consideration.

Don't take your guns to town son Leave your guns at home, Bill Don't take your guns to town —Johnny Cash

Freedom and Responsibility

Personal freedom comes with responsibility and we should keep this in mind with Senate Bill 176 (now headed for the Judiciary Committee) that will allow students to keep and carry guns on the university of Alaska campuses. Rational people should find that frightening. There is a lot of violence in this country and the use of alcohol and drugs has escalated.

Imagine a person, not necessarily a student, when they are drunk, or stoned, or angry and armed with a weapon. Imagine a person getting into an argument or failing a test and taking it out on the professor. There are some places where we need to be free from the threat or possibility of violence. We need to be free from the threat of a gun. Schools, hospitals, churches should be weapon-free sanctuaries.

Even though it is legal to carry a concealed weapon, private businesses and public meeting places have the right and responsibility to prohibit guns on their property.

FYI In Johnny Cash's song young Bill was shot dead in a bar with his mother's warning words on his dying lips.

Alaska State Senate passed Senate Bill 123, sponsored by Senator Kevin Meyer (R-Anchorage), which allows

Senate passes bill allowing municipalities local con-municipalities to adopt ordinances to ban talking on cellphones while driving in school zones or on school property. Although SB123 allows municipalities to pass ordinances coverage cellphone use in school zones or on school property, it does not require them to do so.

"This is not a state mandate. We needed to change the Alaska Uniform Traffic Laws Act (Sec. 28.01.010) at the State level in order for municipalities to be able to have local control. Nothing becomes illegal by the passage of this bill. This simply gives the decision to residents of municipalities and boroughs," said Senator Meyer.

Senator Meyer introduced the bill after it was brought to his attention by a constituent, David Wight, who approached the Anchorage Assembly more than three years ago to pass an ordinance banning talking on cellphones while driving in school zones or on school property. Wight has been volunteering as a crossing guard at Bowman Elementary School in Anchorage for several years.

In a letter of support for SB123, Wight testified, "I have had people on cell phones run the stop signs, not stop when I direct them to stop, make incorrect turns and go in the exit only lane. They have also turned too sharply, ending up on the curb where children are waiting to cross the street. I have had to tap on car windows as cars approach the stop sign and all I can see is the top of their head while they use their phone. The worst case was being rear ended right after school was out as I stopped quickly to avoid a child running across the street. The driver behind me did not see my car much less the child in front of me. A cell phone was in use and the driver considered the call important even when told about the child.'

However, as Wight soon learned, the Municipality could not pass the ordinance due to the state's Uniform Traffic Laws, which require all traffic laws to be the same across the state. SB123 would allow Municipalities to bring the decision about school zones to the local level.

"It's a significant concern, not only in our schools, but across our community," Anchorage School District Superintendent

Ed Graff testified to the Senate Community and Regional Affairs Committee. "But with the school zones and the areas with hundreds of pedestrians, bicyclists, vehicles on a daily basis- you mix that with a distracted driver, you know, it's just too great potential for an accident or injury to happen."

"We adamantly support this. I really want to see us be able to get legislation of this type passed before we have that type of an accident in a school zone rather than after," said Anchorage Assemblyman Ernie Hall.

SB123 now heads to the House for further considera-

Cat parasite found in western Arctic beluga deemed infectious

University of British Columbia issued a press release, saying that scientists have found an infectious form of the cat parasite Toxoplasma gondii in western Arctic beluga whales, which prompted a health advisory in Canada. As of press time, the Alaska Dept. of Health and Social Services has not issued any advisory for Alaska.

Presenting their findings last week at the 2014 Annual Meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Dr. Michael Grigg and Dr. Stephen Raverty from UBC's Marine Mammal Research Unit say that the "big thaw" occurring in the Arctic is allowing neverbefore-seen movement of pathogens between the Arctic and the lower lat-

"Ice is a major eco-barrier for pathogens," said Michael Grigg, a molecular parasitologist with the U.S. National Institutes of Health and an adjunct professor at UBC. "What we're seeing with the big thaw is the liberation of pathogens gaining access to vulnerable new hosts and wreaking havoc."

Toxoplasmosis, also known as kitty litter disease, is the leading cause of infectious blindness in humans and can be fatal to fetuses and to people and animals with compromised immune systems.

"Belugas are not only an integral part of Inuit culture and folklore, but also a major staple of the traditional diet. Hunters and community members are very concerned about food safety and security," said Raverty, a veterinary pathologist with the B.C. Ministry of Agriculture and Lands' Animal Health Centre and an adjunct professor at UBC. Raverty has led the systematic sampling and screening of hunter-harvested beluga for 14 years.

Grigg has also identified the culprit of the 2012 grey seal die-off as a new strain of Sarcocystis. While not harmful to humans, the Arctic parasite, which was named Sarcocystis pinnipedi at the AAAS meeting, has killed an endangered Steller sea lion, seals, Hawaiian monk seals, walruses, polar and grizzly bears in Alaska and as far south as British Columbia.

U.S. Secretary John Kerry to establish special rep for the Arctic

State Department Secretary John Kerry announced the Department will soon have a special representative for the Arctic region. "I informed my two former Senate colleagues [Sen. Begich and Sen. Murkowski] that here at the State Department we will soon have a Special Representative for the Arctic Region, a highlevel official of stature who will play a critical role in advancing American interests in the Arctic Region, particularly as we prepare efforts for the United States to Chair the Arctic Council in 2015," Kerry said last week. "President Obama and I are committed to elevating our attention and effort to keep up with the opportunities and consequences presented by the Arctic's rapid transformation—a very rare convergence of almost every national priority in the most rapidly-changing region on the face of the earth.'

Kerry addressed the importance of the new position especially for Alaska. "The great challenges of the Arctic matter enormously to the United States, and they hit especially close to home for Alaska, which is why it is no wonder that Senator Begich's very first piece of legislation aimed to create an Arctic Ambassador, or why as Foreign Relations Committee Chairman I enjoyed a close partnership with Senator Murkowski on a treaty vital to energy and maritime interests important to Alaska. Going forward, I look forward to continuing to work closely with Alaska's Congressional delegation to strengthen America's engagement in Arctic issues," Kerry

Senator Lisa Murkowski welcomed the news, but also criticized the White House for taking half measures. "The White House's lackluster efforts to seize the opportunities opening up in the Arctic have been a national embarrassment to this point. The other Arctic nations are proceeding full steam ahead and even non-Arctic nations like Italy, India, China and South Korea are all making an Arctic push - while America slips further behind," said Murkowski. "Though I welcome the administration paying more attention and devoting more energy to an Arctic agenda, I question whether or not the title 'Special Representative' is on par with an Ambassador, a position I've consistently recommended. Seven of the eight Arctic nations have an Arctic Ambassador, and I'm not sure we are there yet. This position demands a high level official with expertise and Arctic knowledge in order to be on par with the international community and I seek clarity from Secretary Kerry on this."

Two new members on Arctic Policy Commission

Senate President Charlie Huggins and Speaker of the House Mike Chenault have appointed Representative David Guttenberg of Fairbanks and Saltchuk Alaska Managing Director Harry McDonald to the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission.

They are to continue the work of Representative Beth Kerttula from Juneau and Steve Scalzo of Foss Maritime. Kerttula left the Legislature to join Stanford's Center for Ocean Solutions as a visiting fellow. Steve Scalzo retired.

Harry McDonald's career began in Seward where his family owned and operated tugs and barges. He later started up a local trucking company, Carlile Transportation which became one of the largest transportation and logistics companies in the State over his 30 years of ownership. Carlile Transportation is one of Alaska's largest trucking, transportation and logistics companies, which was acquired by Saltchuk as part of their family of companies mid-year 2013.

We are excited that Harry has agreed to be a part of the Commission," AAPC Co-Chair Senator Lesil McGuire said. "He brings a wealth of technical and commercial experience, and we're confident that he will add significant value to the Commission.'

David Guttenberg came to Alaska in 1969 to fight forest fires and never left. He is a retired member of the Laborers and spent many years working in remote Alaska. In 2002, he successfully made the transition from staff to legislator when he was elected as Representative for House District 8.

He has been reelected five consecutive times and currently represents House District 38, encompassing western Fairbanks, Ester, Interior river villages, and rural communities all the way to the Bering Sea coast. The opportunity to represent rural Alaska has sharpened his long-standing interest in Arctic issues and commitment to Bush Alaska. He is a three-term member of the House Finance committee.

Culley has been nudging the City administration and Council towards a procurement policy since he was elected in October.

Culley has been agitating for a procedure to limit strings of project change orders that push prices beyond the original contracts.

City Manager Josie Bahnke has been working with Julie Liew, finance director, along with the City's attorney firm, to draw up a new ordinance for approval by the Council. Bahnke has brought up from time to time the City's need for a policy, observing that most other cities have such laws.

"The City of Nome needs a new procurement policy because, quite frankly, the past stewards of the citizens' money have lacked the accountability for how it was spent." Culley said. "Without a stringent policy in place, it was easy for them to not have to answer for their actions as there were no defined requirements on the City's spending. With a new, and more stringent, policy in place, "the backroom", "behind the scenes", "pay your buddy a higher price" purchases and payments will be a thing of the past.

The current policy signed by Renshaw in 1973 does refer to transparency in stating, "All contracts for the purchase of goods and services by the City shall be open to inspection by the public."

According to the ancient contract, the city manager is authorized to make contracts for goods and services if they are named for expenditure in the fiscal year budget, otherwise, the Council can authorize spending not in the fiscal year budget or needing to come from the contingency fund.

For the construction of the public safety building, a 2009 statement of "Procurement Guidelines" contains a list of "shoulds" to do with competition and sole source non-competitive procurement, calling for the city manager's prior written approval for noncompetitive expenditures in excess of $100,000. The Procurement Guidelines in this case are not backed up by City law.

The proposed ordinance sets out terms for competitive and noncompetitive spending and sets dollar limits. It also sets out authorized purchase agent positions.

The document, worked over by the Council at a recent work session. spells out the need for the chapter entering the Nome Code of Ordinances,

- Maximize the purchasing value of public funds.
- Provide for a procurement system of quality and integrity.
- · Clearly define the authority for purchasing within the city organiza-

• Establish consistent procurement principles for all departments of the

The proposed ordinance selects the city manager as purchasing agent. It allows the manager to delegate the power to purchase goods and services to department heads with a $10,000 limit.

The city manager could let contracts for services, goods and construction within a $40,000 limit without Council approval, and report quarterly to the Council on all expenditures over $10,000.

No contracts for services, goods or construction obligating the City for over $40,000 may be executed unless the Council has approved a memorandum setting forth:

- Contractor's identity.
- Contract price.
- Nature and quantity of the performance the City would receive.
  - Using department.
- Time for performance under the contract.

The city manager can sign a contract as an emergency procurement, but the life of such contract cannot go beyond the next regular Council meeting without Council approval.

Under the proposal, no amendments to contracts could happen without the Council approving a memorandum setting forth the changes to the contract terms if the change will push the price to exceed $40,000 or 110 percent of the original price or $41,000, whichever is greater.

The proposed law has a long section on crossing the tees and dotting the eyes for competitive sealed bidding. The section, as proposed, requires the City to publish an invitation to bid in a newspaper of general circulation in the city and to post invitations to bid in a place in the city offices designated by the city manager, at least 14 days before the bid deadline. There is a note on the draft ordinance from the city attorney suggesting that cities are now using their Web sites to publish bid invitations, either in addition to newspapers or instead of newspaper notices.

Bids must be opened in a public place at a stated time. If the lowest bid exceeds the funds for the project, goods or services set by the financial manager, then requirements may be scaled back and a new bid invitation issued, or if time demands, the purchasing agent may negotiate with one or more of the lower and responsive bidders to lower their price.

Or, if there is a significant differential between what a purchase or service should cost, the procurement agent could reject all bids.

A cynic could say that this process could open the door to bid rigging, as could sections in the proposed law covering sole source procurement and limited competition procurement.

Councilman Jerald Brown stated he "strongly believed that we need a local vendor preference," that local vendor preference could possibly be met by hiring local subcontractors.

Additionally, "we need to add a mandate that if a contractor takes advantage of a local preference option, a certain percentage of the labor has to be local," Brown advised.

The latter term refers to the draft proposal's section 17.40.130 that allows the "purchasing agent to procure supplies, services construction having an estimated value not exceeding $50,000, by soliciting bids or proposals from a limited number of potential contractors under this section.'

The draft ordinance continues. "The purchasing agent will identify vendors that are qualified and available to provide the supplies, services or construction, and solicit bids or proposals from at least three vendors. or from all vendors if there are no more than three. The solicitation may be either oral or written, and shall be in a form reasonably calculated to yield the lowest responsive bid by a responsible bidder. The purchasing agent shall award the contract to the lowest responsive and responsible bidder.'

Alerted that an oral solicitation without documentation failed to protect the purchasing agent from charges of favoritism, City Manager Josie Bahnke said that "oral" would be taken out.

Targeting providers

Section 17.40.140 allows the purchasing agent to award a contract for goods, services or construction without competition where the purchasing agent determines in writing that the City's requirements reasonably limit the source for the supplies. services or construction to one bid-

A cynic would conclude this clause potentially backs up a timehonored, classic method of bid rigging, where a tailor-made bid invitation includes a requirement that can be met by only by a favored, preselected contractor.

Councilmembers pointed out that some contractors not allowed to sit at the club table are excluded because they do not have sufficient insurance or bonding capability upon which to risk City liability.

The draft ordinance orders that contractors in violation of City sales tax and property taxes could be excluded from contract awards.

'We ought to apply payment to debt owed before paying anything," Councilman Tom Sparks suggested.

Because there might be disputes on the amount owed, it might not be appropriate to apply this requirement, Bahnke said.

The draft ordinance does not echo the 1973 ordinance in calling for contracts to be open to public inspection, but that requirement is covered by state law and citizens who hold public officials to the law.

Council approval of procurement, contracts and spending limits would help, Culley said.

'The people of Nome count on the Council to be good stewards of their hard earned money, and the fact that it's been 41 years before this new policy has been meaningfully discussed (and hopefully passed) is astounding...and a little embarrassing," Culley said.

Port Commission ponders selective increase of port fees

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Port Commission has combed over its tariff to get a grip on needed changes for the 2014 shipping season and found few procedural changes and some hikes in user fees.

At a Feb. 13 work session the panel rejected the idea of raising fees across-the-board but showed a consensus to pick and choose some items that needed to bring in more revenue to pay costs.

In areas where the budget was not hurting, they shouldn't raise fees, port administrators said.

"A 10 percent increase last year was hard enough for me to vote for," Commissioner Jim West, Jr. said.

"I'm not in favor of a five or 10 percent across-the-board increase this year. We should pick and choose [fees that need an increase]."

Joy Baker, project manager, saw a need for fee increases to pay for higher costs for maintenance and labor generated by increased shipping and mining traffic in and out of the port.

"We can't afford to do nothing," Baker said.

If not 10 percent, maybe three to five percent would be a good idea,

Under terminal storage is a proposed tariff revision spelling out winter and summer dry dock flat rates for larger home-ported vessels of 71 ft. to 90 ft. to pay $2,500 for November through May and $1,805 from June through October; vessels 91 ft. and over would pay $4,500 for winter and $3,280 for summer.

Commissioners liked a hike in terminal storage fees for all cargo and equipment stored at Port of Nome.

For open storage on uplands east and west of the Snake River (except the Causeway) the suggested new fee is 10 cents per sq. ft. per week, and for open storage on the causeway or docks, 15 cents per sq. ft. per week.

These rates keep Nome lower than other places in the state, according to port administrators.

Commissioners cannot take an official vote in work sessions, but can achieve consensus on measures to bring to a vote at a regular meeting of the body.

No parking

Panel members discussed allowing winter boat storage on the Causeway at a high price to make owners think twice before opting for that alternative at the end of the season, but then agreed instead to bar boat storage on the Causeway.

The risk was too great, commissioners decided, that a crane would become unavailable at breakup or some other interference would leave a boat on the Causeway to interrupt the shipping season, causing a loss of customers and delays in offloading

"The Causeway is our lifeline to the outer world," Commissioner Rolland Trowbridge declared. The discussion of boats on the Causeway stemmed from Phoenix Marine deciding to stash a craft on the causeway near freeze-up time rather than take it south.

The port is having an issue with cargo users being lax in securing access to restricted areas during their operations per the U.S. Coast Guard.

Under tenancy agreement cargo users have a responsibility to keep their areas secure according to the security plan Port of Nome has filed with the USCG.

A proposed addition to the Port of Nome Tariff said that if companies failed to secure access, they could receive fines and be cut from the port's security plan.

This would exclude the company from using the facility until they had arranged a stand-alone plan of their own with the Coast Guard.

Liability insurance

Over past meetings the Commission has tossed about the idea of lowering insurance requirements for smaller craft, but have rejected the idea.

The tariff will continue to demand companies and persons using the Port of Nome for any purpose to have on file a certificate of liability insurance of $1 million naming the port as certificate holder and additionally insured before they are allowed to work within the facility.

The commissioners discussed requiring full dockage rates for ancillary craft—tugs, barges and landing craft that are taking up a large amount of space in the crowded harbor.

Before now, docking permits have been available but not required for vessels using only the inner harbor.

West suggested that these vessels could use the outer harbor for hanging out

Commissioners suggested that a requirement for a stable gangway for every vessel secured to a structure or lying aside another vessel secured at the Causeway be changed to "stable access," as hardly any vessels use a gangway.

Leave staff out of it

At Baker's urging, commissioners will certainly approve at the adoption of the tariff revisions a requirement that all charges with a vessel's port call go on one invoice, with no splitting of bills for different parts of the operation performed by separate entities.

"Splitting bills puts a lot of pressure on staff," Baker told commissioners. "It caused a lot of grief, extra hours and extra costs chasing people down."

Commissioners and port staff turned a cold shoulder to divvying up refunds on storage and docking permits also.

According to the tariff, no refunds will be issued for prepaid storage or docking permits. Users who sell their prepaid space to another user must negotiate the prepaid value with the buyer without any involvement from port staff.

Harbormaster Lucas Stotts strongly suggested that welding and other repairs to vessels without prior approval of harbor staff come to an

A section of the tariff states that any hot work (welding, cutting) or sandblasting whether on a vessel or dockside has to be approved by the port director and authorization request forms submitted.

"Otherwise, if they don't get approval, they will be charged a fine," Stotts declared.

The tariff sets out fines of $500 for the first violation, $750 for the second, and $950 for subsequent violation, with each day counting as a separate violation.

"At other ports, if someone pulls out a grinder, people are all over you," Trowbridge commented. "I can't believe what goes on in Nome."

Persons storing vessels on Port of Nome property will have to use commercial grade boat stands for all vessel types except flat bottom vessels or skiffs of less than 20 feet.

"We're getting hurricane force winds out there," Trowbridge observed, adding that the commercial stands should be chained together to stabilize the components during high wind.

Alaska Airlines set to change flight schedule

By Diana Haecker

In response to complaints from Nome residents and business people, Alaska Airlines will change the departure time of one flight on Tuesdays, starting March 11.

Alaska Airlines spokeswoman Bobbie Egan said the morning flight from Anchorage to Nome would depart at 7 a.m. in Anchorage, arriving in Nome at 8:32 a.m. and departing from Nome at 9:30 a.m., landing in Anchorage at 10:45 a.m.

Flights operating from Wednesday to Monday will depart Anchorage at 10:10 a.m., arrive in Nome at 11:41 a.m. and depart again at 12:35 p.m., arriving in Anchorage at 1:59 p.m.

Beginning March 9, flight 153 from Anchorage to Nome will again leave at 5:30 p.m., go to Kotzebue and arrive in Nome at 8:24 p.m.

Beginning August 25, 2013
Alaska Airlines reduced the number of flights from Anchorage to Nome from three to two daily flights and changed departure times. The change also did away with the loop that connected Nome to Kotzebue. Travelers to Kotzebue must now fly to Anchorage and then board a connecting flight to Kotzebue.

As Alaska Airlines is the only major airline to provide daily jet service to and from Nome, the change impacts nearly every resident and business in Nome and surrounding communities. Airline officials said the reason for the schedule change was the need to control costs as fuel prices continue to rise. The schedule change impacted businesses, which depend on the timely delivery of goods, such as groceries and fresh flowers. Also, it had the effect that day trips to Anchorage — going to Anchorage just for the day for business meetings or doctor appointments — were rendered impossible, forcing people to stay overnight and adding to travel expenses.

Bobbie Egan said the change of time was made to allow "those who need to make a day trip, to do so on Tuesdays."

After the initial schedule change, the Nome Chamber of Commerce conducted a business survey and submitted the results to Alaska Airlines. The chamber welcomed the announced changes that will begin to take effect next month, but hope for more early morning departures out of Nome beyond Tuesdays.

"The Nome Chamber is happy to have a good relationship with Alaska Airlines and will continue working together for the benefit of Nome residents and businesses who rely on this service," said Nome Chamber of Commerce executive director Barb Nickels.

quested $800,000 for the planning and design of a housing complex to offer assisted living, Pre-maternal Home and accommodations for Health Aide trainees. The housing complex would be constructed adjacent to the current patient hostel just south of the new Norton Sound Regional hospital. The final designs are supposed to be drawn by the spring.

The NSHC Board of Directors in their meeting last month approved the concept of the Wellness and Training Center, to put BHS, Public Health, Health Aide training and EMS training and offices under one roof.

The concept of the Wellness Center does not include inpatient care, meaning that patients from out of town will need a place to stay as they go through the program to set them on the path of sobriety. Gorn said the goal is to provide intensive outpatient therapy and social detox for people who need long-term substance abuse treatments. Locating both BHS and the Wellness Center close to the new hospital would result in programmatic efficiencies.

But since the Wellness Center would only deal with acute cases, and no inpatient care, the outpatient concept requires additional housing. Currently, the east wing of the patient hostel or ten beds, are used for expecting mothers from out-of-town.

Housing needs

The Patient Hostel has a capacity of 38 beds, of which Pre-maternal Home patients are occupying ten beds currently.

Since Prematernal Moms are in the complex, there are stricter rules for the rest of the Patient Hostel as well. Those house rule exclude persons with a barrier crime in their past from being housed there. Patients who have committed barrier crimes are currently housed at the Polaris Hotel.

This is where the envisioned Housing complex comes into play, explained Gorn. NSHC proposes a new housing complex building that would offer eight beds for expecting mothers at the Pre-maternal Home; ten units for assisted living quarters for the elderly; and 22 beds for Health Aides in training.

For this, NSHC has already received $400,000 in state funds.

The housing complex, also to be built next on the property adjacent to the existing Patient Hostel, would free up rooms at the Patient Hostel and would do away with the barrier crime exclusion.

Patients from out-of-Nome participating in BHS programs at the Wellness Center could thus be housed at the hostel.

Health Aide training

NSHC is one of three facilities in the state that trains health aides. Bethel and the Alaska Native Health Consortium in Anchorage are the other two facilities. Gorn said this year; NSHC trained 16 health aides who hail from other than the Norton Sound/Bering Strait region. "We train 60 community health aides per year and there is a long waiting list," said Gorn. The training is funded by NSHC, with a $200,000 contribution from the State of Alaska. "The goal is to increase the number of health aides trained, even those from out of the region, but we need the facility to do so," said Gorn.

Currently, community health aides are trained in a mock clinic building, which, years ago, was supposed to be the Teller clinic. It is a 2,500 sq. ft. clinic model, which is too small of a facility to provide adequate training. Gorn said, the primary care unit at the new hospital is used for health aide training as well, but the commute between the clinic behind the old hospital and the new hospital takes up time.

Regional needs

In addition, NSHC also requested $14 million to build clinics in Gambell and Savoonga clinics ($10 million) and to design new clinics at Diomede and Shaktoolik for $2 million each NSHC partnered with Kawerak Inc. to pilot a new concept in St. Michael. In order to alleviate the housing problem, NSHC and Kawerak applied and received a $1.1 million grant from the Alaska Housing Finance Corporation to build a threeunit apartment complex to house the community's VPSO, a mid-level health care provider and clinicians such as dental health aides or traveling staff. The lion's share of the total budget of $1.4 million was awarded with the AHFC grant. NSHC budgeted $200,000 and St. Michael provided the land, worth $9,000.

On the wish list presented to the state and the Congressional Delegation last month, NSHC identified several projects that need funding, including improvements to clinics in Shaktoolik, Shishmaref, Little Diomede, Wales, Gambell and Savoonga.

The Denali Commission approved recently $1 million for upgrades to the Shishmaref clinic.

NSEDC contributed $330,000 to complete the upgrade to the 1,800 sq. ft. Wales clinic totaling $867,000.

RETIRING U.S. FLAGS (top)— JROTC cadets Captain John Tocktoo, Captain Tristan Matson and Sergeant First Class Louis Anowlic-Seeganna were part of last week's flag retirement ceremony.

The JROTC curriculum includes learning about the U.S. flag, the history, the proper manner in which to present and to care for it and how to properly dispose of the flag when it is no longer serviceable. JROTC cadets collected old flags from the Nome community and respectfully destroyed them at a ceremony. All participants were given a star from one of the flags as a remembrance of the ceremony.

from Fairbanks to Tanana and to Ruby. "The Yukon was flat and smooth," reports Morgan. "But the coast is in bad shape.'

The lack of snow is forcing the racers to restrain their urge to go fast. The number one concern is to keep the machines cool and from overheating. Kicked-up snow usually cools the motor as the competitors open the throttle and let the sleds run in excess of 100 mph. Since the trails are icy but devoid of snow, the racers now employ so-called ice scrapers off the trail and fling them at the motor for a cooling effect. "We will take our time and make sure the machines stay cool," said Morgan.

He said he won't do the same as in 2010 when he was forced to withdraw when he pushed his machine too hard and blew the coolant out of the motor. "I will have to restrain myself," he said.

Morgan said he's not worried about the poor snow conditions. "I know for a fact that our sleds do better in these conditions [than other brands]," Morgan said. He added that he's looking forward to get back on Fairbanks. "Hopefully we'll be first," he said.

With the technically challenging part of crossing the Alaska Range and narrow twisting trails through trees behind them, Morgan and Olds are leading the race. They arrived in McGrath on Sunday evening, took their 14-hour layover and left Mc-Grath at 11:07 a.m. They planned to get to Kaltag by Monday and ride up the coast to Nome in daylight to arrive at the halfway point in Nome sometime on Tuesday evening.

Morgan and Old's trail support is Mike's father Stan Morgan and copilot Evan Booth, who are flying along the trail with a plane loaded with spare parts.

As of Monday, two teams had scratched from the race.

Village news

By Nils Hahn

Unalakleet

According to William "Middy" Johnson, local musher, the trails around Unalakleet are hard and icy, with just a dusting of snow on top of the ice. The trail from Kaltag to Old Woman isn't too bad; from Old Woman to Unalakleet the trail in the flats is hard and fast. The trail from Unalakleet to Shaktoolik is hard, icy and fast with lots of bare tundra.

The Unalakleet River froze high last fall and is good and safe. The Iditarod Trail should be all right as of now, unless the region receives more rain before or during the Iditarod.

People from Unalakleet haven't been going out as much since the traveling conditions are really hard on snowmachines. Normally local hunters hunt caribou towards Koyuk and Shaktoolik. This year due to the rough trails traveling is a lot slower, making it harder for people to go on hunting trips.

As of February 17 the Portage 200 dog sled race slated for the end of February has not been cancelled. A decision will be made by the Norton Sound Sled Dog Club later this

There isn't enough sea ice on the ocean in front of Unalakleet for the local fleet of ice crabbers as of February 17. Trout have been hard to find this winter due to how the rivers froze early on. Tomcod came in strong, and then disappeared, now they are back

Shaktoolik

According to longtime Shaktoolik checker and Iditarod musher Palmer

Sagoonick there is enough snow around Shaktoolik for the dog teams. The trail from Shaktoolik across Norton Bay to Koyuk is in very good shape and the ice is really safe.

It has been a terrible winter for local hunters. People are just now starting to hunt for caribou. A positive aspect to a warm winter is that locals had to burn less heating oil as well as less firewood to heat their homes.

Caribou are currently located about 50 miles from Shaktoolik. Until a couple of weeks ago traveling by snowmachine was really rough, mostly going across bare tun-

The trail through the Blueberry Hills between Unalakleet and Shaktoolik is very icy. The Iron Dog racers should improve the trail by scraping up the ice, thus increasing traction for the Iditarod dog teams.

Locals have been staying closer to town due to the poor traveling conditions as well as the high cost of fuel. It cost $70-80 to fill up a snowmachine.

A positive aspect of the high cost of fuel and the low snow winter is that there is a lot of camaraderie between people. People have been sharing food and information, letting other villagers know where the fishing is good and where it isn't. People have been sharing more of what they

White Mountain

According to Dan Harrelson of White Mountain, there is very little snow in the area, 4"-5" of snow cover on the open tundra with deeper snow in the trees. Trails are hard with very little snow and a lot of tundra and tussocks. The trail is marked as well as possible in these conditions, since it is difficult placing trail stakes in frozen tundra. The trail across Golovin Bay is staked. Due to the icy conditions holes were cut into the ice in order to place trail stakes. The trail from Elim to White Mountain is hard and rough but doable.

The weather has been cold for the last week, resulting in no overflow as well as no open water. Two weeks ago during the rain event there was some open water in the area, but conditions are better now.

This winter has been very difficult for local hunters. Caribou are 40-50 miles away from White Mountain and due to the low snow conditions traveling is very hard on hunters and their snowmachines. In a normal winter, now is the time for people to restock their freezers with caribou meat. Not so this year.

On the other hand it has been easier for locals getting firewood since traveling in the trees is easier. People have been staying home more.

Iditarod to start in Willow Race officials of the Iditarod Trail Committee said Monday that the restart of 42nd Iditarod Trail Sled Dog race would take place in Willow, as usual. The lack of snow at long stretches of the traditional trail led the ITC to ponder to restart the race in Fairbanks, as was done in 2003. But on Monday, the ITC board of directors heard detailed plans of utilizing specialized grooming equipment to put in an overland trail from Willow to Yentna River and from Yentna Station to Skwentna that would avoid icy river conditions.

However, the heavy duty equipment won't be able to create a trail once the mushers get into the areas such as the Steps, the Dalzell Gorge and the snowless stretch of 75 miles between Rohn and Nikolai. Even in years with adequate snow cover, those areas are technically challenging for mushers and their dog teams. 'While we will be the first to point out that various sections of the trail as they exist today are in some cases in poor condition, we are confident that we have access to the right resources and have a plan in place to provide for a trail which will be as safe as practical given the nature of this race," said Race Director Mark Nordman.

Seventy mushers and their teams are signed up to run the 2014 Iditarod. The ceremonial start will be held in Anchorage on March 1. The real start will take place in Willow the following day at 2 p.m.

Nome Nanook boys are Valdez Tournament champions

By Sarah Miller

The Nanook Boys Basketball team continued its winning streak this weekend at the Valdez Elk's Tournament. The opening round took place on Thursday against the Seward Seahawks, and ended up being a big game for a number of Nome's players. Four Nanooks scored in the double digits for Nome:

Tyler Eide (14 points), Daniel Head (12), Klay Baker (11), and Matt Tunley (10). On a free throw in the fourth quarter, Eide scored his 1000th career point, joining an elite group of former Nanooks in the 1000 Point Club. Nome defeated Seward with a final score of 57-36.

Friday's game against Hutchison High School in Fairbanks saw the Nanooks advance further in the winner's bracket. The first half of the game was close, with Nome leading by only two points at halftime. However, Nome took off during the second half of the game and kept the Hawks from scoring all but five points in the entire two periods. In contrast, the Nanooks scored 29 points and went on to victory at 54-

28. Eide again led in scoring at 19 points, followed by Baker and Mattheis at 8, Head and Gray with 6, and Tunley with 4. Jake Stettenbenz contributed 3 points as well.

On Saturday, Nome faced off against conference rival Barrow in the tournament championship game. Ready for battle, the Whalers started off with 3 three-point shots and then proceeded to hold off the Nanooks for the first two quarters. After halftime, the Nanooks were ready to take over control of the game, strengthening defensive play and benefiting from scoring by Eide (19 points), Mattheis (15), Head (13), Baker (9), Gray (6), Stettenbenz (3) and Tunley (2). Four of Nome's players put up a total of 10 three-point shots in this game. The Whalers' best efforts weren't enough to stop the Nanooks from taking the tournament championship title home with the final score of 65-57 points.

A number of Nanooks were recognized for their skill and talent at the tournament. Tyler Eide was named the tourney's Most Valuable Player. Klay Baker was recognized as the Three-Point Shooting Champion, and Cass Mattheis and Baker were named to the All-Tournament Team. A proud weekend for the Nanooks Boys' Basketball Team, as their season record now stands at 14-6. Next up, Nome and Barrow will meet again at this weekend's Norton Sound Shootout, where the Whalers will certainly be looking to redeem themselves on the court. Games begin Friday evening, preceded by the Nome Boys Senior Night Cere-

The Lady Nanooks did not fare as well at the tournament, beginning with Thursday's opening game against Skyview High School. Despite the 13 points contributed by Ariana Horner, and the 9 points from Addy Ahmasuk, Nome was defeated 45-24. The Lady Nanooks next faced Barrow in Friday's game, in which Senora Ahmasuk put a respectable 14 points up on the board, as well as Horner, again with 12 points. Nonetheless, Barrow took the victory with a final score of 61-36. In their last game at the tournament, the Lady Nanooks lost to Kotzebue in a closer game, with a final score of 43-34 points. Senora Ahmasuk, sophomore, was recognized by being named to the women's All Tournament Team. The Lady Nanooks will be on the road next weekend in Barrow.

The Norton Sound Shootout begins this Thursday, with the boys and girls JV teams playing against Gambell. Friday games include teams from Chevak, Shishmaref, Brevig Mission, and as mentioned, the boys varsity game against Nome at 8:15 p.m. Saturday's games begin at 9:30 a.m. and conclude with the second game against Barrow at 8:15 p.m. The awards ceremony takes place after the 6:30 p.m. game.

MVP— Nome Nanook Tyler Eide was named the tourney's Most Valuable Player. Eide scored 14 points against the Seward Seahawks, 19 points against Hutchison High School from Fairbanks and 19 points against the Barrow Whalers. A freethrow during the game against the Seahawks Eide scored his 1,000th point for the Nanooks.

NOME AGAINST FAIRBANKS— Alex Gray goes one-on-one against Hutchinson's Spencer Johnston.

THREE POINTS— Jake Stettenbenz goes up for a long three-point shot against a Seward Seahawks player. The Nanooks one the game against the Seahawks 57 to 36 points.

Dry skin: How to protect the dermis in winter

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Winter can be hard on people with dry skin. Even healthy skin has trouble retaining moisture in the low relative humidity of dry winter air. This loss of moisture often hampers the skin's protective function and makes chronic skin conditions very hard to manage during the winter

Normally, skin provides an excellent protective barrier for the body as it stretches and glides over underlying tissues. As skin looses its moisture in winter, the bonds between cells in the outermost layer, called the stratum corneum, begin to break down, leading to fis-

These small cracks can be an uncomfortable nuisance. But for many people, a breech in the protective layer of skin allows normally benign allergens, bacteria, or fungi to come in contact with underlying tissues leading to allergic dermatitis, cellulitis, or fungal infections.

For this reason, adults and children with dry skin or people with chronic skin conditions like eczema, psoriasis, or allergic dermatitis, must take extra care in the winter to protect their skin.

The key to controlling dry skin in the winter is to keep the outer layer of skin hydrated. Here are a few > principles for ALASKA keeping s k i n FAMILY moist: First, DOCTOR recognize and a v o i d behaviors that aggravate dry skin. Take warm as opposed to hot showers, minimize the use of soaps, and pat dry after bathing.

Second, use ointments to seal in skin moisture. The thickest oily moisturizers with ingredients like petrolatum, lanolin, and mineral oil work best. Most experts recommend using a "soak and smear" method tened skin at least twice daily after bathing, showering, or washing hands. Using ointments daily is like painting a house. It protects the barrier and keeps elements out. If applied regularly, it keeps maintenance

Third, keep the body well hydrated. Healthy adults should consume between two and three liters of fluid daily from all sources. The actual amount needed depends on many factors including age, weight, and daily activity level. In general, a person should consume enough fluid to prevent thirst and produce relatively clear urine throughout the day.

Including healthy oils in the diet, like olive oil, fish oil, and seal oil may also help preserve the presence of natural oils in the skin.

Finally, seek medical care if dry skin leads to inflammation or infection of surrounding tissues. Pain, itching, spreading redness, or oozing from areas of dry, cracked, or scaly skin can be symptoms of a more serious medical problem. Your provider can diagnose the cause of inflammation or infection and prescribe the proper mix of ointment,

Shaktoolik youth receives 2014 Spirit of Youth award for ocean bravery

Donald Auliye of Shaktoolik has been selected as a 2014 Spirit of Youth award recipient in the category of Lifesaver and Prevention for his bravery and quick response during ocean emergencies.

Auliye is an experienced fisherman. On two occasions the 18-yearold has responded to distress calls from other boats, once instructing the passengers to put on life vests before their vessel capsized where he later pulled them to shore.

"I went into the water and grabbed them both, pulled them up onto the beach, put them by the fire, warmed them up and brought them home," Aulive said in a recent interview. "Fishermen, we look out for each other here.'

During a huge storm last fall, the village went into emergency mode.

Steve Sammons, principal at Shaktoolik School, said Auliye played a big part in the safety efforts.

"He stayed up late and helped watch both the ocean and the riverside that almost flooded the village,' Sammons said in a Spirit of Youth radio story. "He was bringing elders to the school and helping families with their personal belongings.

Auliye will be honored with the other winners at the Spirit of Youth Awards Dinner Saturday, April 5, at 6 p.m. at the Anchorage Marriott Downtown. He was chosen from more than 150 statewide nominations by the Spirit of Youth Teen Advisory Council.

Spirit of Youth changes community perceptions about Alaska's teens. Through use of media and recognition the organization highlights youths' accomplishments and demonstrates that teens are caring contributors in our communities. Spirit of Youth has shared hundreds of positive stories about Alaska youth through their public radio series, which broadcasts to nearly 100 communities across the state.

The Spirit of Youth Awards Dinner is the organization's premiere event highlighting dedicated young people and unsung heroes from around Alaska. Now in its 16th year, the awards dinner recognizes the hard work and efforts of these future leaders who utilize this opportunity to share their inspiring and heartwarming stories. Guests at the event include the families and supporters of the awardees as well as community leaders, educators and dignitaries. Tickets for the award banquet be purchased spiritofyouth.org.

Arthur Ahkinga June 5, 1945 – February 3, 2014

Arthur Ahkinga was born on June 5, 1945, to loving parents, Eva Akhvaluk Ahkinga and Peter Oscar Ahkinga. Arthur also had twin sisters, Leona and Lorna, and a brother who died not long after birth.

Arthur lived most of his life on Diomede, where his greatest passion was hunting. He also provided much appreciated service to his community as an Eskimo Walrus Commissioner, an Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commissioner, a Norton Sound Health Corporation board member representing Diomede, IRA President, and Inaliq Native Corporation Board President.

Arthur also served his state and country for three years as a member of the Alaska National Guard.

Arthur worked as a bi-lingual instructor in Diomede, sharing his wealth of traditional knowledge about Diomede's language, culture and history, and as a teacher aide. He also collaborated with Carol Jollis on her study of traditional Diomede life, and contributed his knowledge of hunting to the Kawerak Walrus Project.

Together with his one-time companion, Edna Iyapana, Arthur had one child, Eric Iyapana, of whom he was always very, very proud. He was also very blessed with grandchildren Blake, Tristan and Erica.

Arthur was a gentle, intelligent, kind man, who loved his village, his family and his friends. He will be dearly missed by all.

Jeannie Rose Waltz

Jeannie Rose Waltz

Jeannie Rose Waltz, 53, of Nome, died February 4, while vacationing with her husband Ken Waltz in Chiapas, Mexico.

Jeannie was born August 16, 1960 in Nome, to Ralph and Margaret Olanna, Sr.

Jeannie was a loving, caring, and giving mother to her only child, Peter Olanna-Bloomstrand. She was such a wonderful wife, sister, daughter, aunt, great aunt, cousin, niece and friend to many. Jeannie had a personality that lit up a room along with her beautiful smile and laughter. She faced life with pluck and compassion. She was always thoughtful and more than willing to help others and share her care and love. Jeannie worked in Nome at the homeless shelter showing empathy to those in need. Jeannie also was a cab driver in Nome for many years. She always loved being around peo-

Jeannie enjoyed traveling, shopping, sewing, crocheting, camping, and berry picking. Jeannie was brave and adventurous through all her world travels, connecting so well with many foreigners. She boasted that she could fit in and get along with Thais, Laotians, and Mayan Indians as an Eskimo. She was the best of travelers. Her husband Ken wrote, "I will forever miss Jeannie, she gave me the best years of my life."

Jeannie's only son wrote "My mother meant the world to me. She was the best anyone could have asked for and I loved her very much.

She was always there for me through thick and thin, never once turning her back on me. She had the biggest heart of anyone I know and helped anyone she encountered who needed it. The very words I'm writing cannot come close to how sorely she will be missed by me and anyone else who knew her. She will always have a special spot in my heart."

She is preceded in death by her father Ralph Olanna, Sr., and survived by her mother Margaret Olanna, her husband Ken Waltz, her son Peter Olanna-Bloomstrand, her sisters Madeline Engebretsen, Pauline Sharpe, her brother Ralph Olanna, Jr, 11 nieces and nephews, and 13 great nieces and nephews.

Pallbearers were Peter Olanna-Bloomstrand, Kevin Crandall, Ryan Crandall and David Crandall. A visitation and memorial service took place at the Alaska Native Lutheran Church in Anchorage on Tuesday, February 18. Jeannie was laid to rest at the Palmer Pioneer Cemetery.

New Task Force Report on ivory ban will not affect Alaskan carvers

Interior Department ban focused on trade of elephant and rhino ivory

A task force report on increased efforts to ban the commercial trade of ivory will not affect Alaska Native carvers who use walrus and whale for their art and tools.

The National Strategy for Combating Wildlife Trafficking, released by the White House this week, is intended to serve as a guide for government-wide efforts to crack down on the illegal poaching and trade of threatened wildlife including African elephants and rhinoceros. The report is part of an overall effort to combat wildlife trafficking.

U.S. Senator Mark Begich voiced his concerns about the report in a December letter in which he urged the Administration to be mindful of both subsistence practices and the economic consequences in rural communities when determining any new restrictions for ivory.

"I'm glad to see the Administration was responsive to my requests and that their guidelines will not negatively impact the culture and economies of rural Alaska communities," said Begich. "I support efforts to stop illegal wildlife trafficking. But Alaskans who acquire ivory legally should not be penalized for carrying on the traditions of their culture and their ancestors. There are small businesses and niche markets that depend on legally acquired ivory pieces for things like musical instruments, firearms, and knife handles."

Soliciting Artists for artwork proposals for the newly renovate Shaktoolik K-12 School.

Per State Statute .5% of the Shaktoolik schools remodel budget will be spent on art for the school, this amounts to $36.142. We are asking interested artists to submit art proposals for the school. Shaktoolik is an Inupiat Eskimo community of 250 sitting on the Eastern shore of Norton Sound. Activities like berry picking, hunting land and sea animals along with commercial and subsistence fishing are an important part of daily life. The K-12 schools mascot is the wolverine and the school colors are maroon and gold. Art proposals are not limited to style, medium or size. If interested it is strongly recommended that you contact the school for areas that may fit your ideas. The school can provide you dimensions and photos. A selection committee will award the artwork contracts to the selected artists. For additional information please contact Principal Sammons at (907) 955-3021.

For consideration you will need to submit:

- 2 a dimensional portrayal depicting your proposal
- Written narrative of your proposal
- Portfolio of prior work
- A lump sum cost of your proposal, also a cost breakdown of your proposals budget
- 2 references
- An attempt will be made to return proposals to the artists after a selection has been made.

Proposals need to be submitted by Feb 15, 2014 to:

The closing of the Koch Brothers-owned Flint Hills Refinery in North Pole, Alaska costs the Fairbanks area a top employer, and breaks a five year commitment they made to Alaska.

"It's shameful that Dan Sullivan willfully accepts the Koch Brothers' millions to prop up Republican Senate candidates like him across the country but has nothing to say to the 80 Alaskans who are losing their jobs because the Kochs feel it's too expensive to keep them employed," said Justin Barasky, a spokesman at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "In between Dan Sullivan rubbing shoulders with Washington lobbyists, Alaskans deserve an explanation from him about why he's OK with the Koch Brothers fighting for him but he can't fight for Alaska families.

School Climate and Connectedness Survey

By Janeen Sullivan

Nome Public Schools will be administering the School Climate and Connectedness Survey to students in grades 5 - 12 for the fourth year in a row. The NPS School Board has chosen to participate in this survey sponsored by the Alaska Association of School Boards again this year. Statewide, over 90 percent of the districts in the state participate in this survey which measures how staff and students in the surveyed grades view their school climate and how connected students feel to adults and their peers.

NPS students are taking the survey between February 17 and 28. Copies of the survey are available at school offices if parents would like to see it. The survey is voluntary so any parent who does not wish their child to participate in the survey can contact their child's school office and request their child not participate.

Survey results are reviewed annually by NPS and help form the direction of the district for the following year.

> CITY OF NOME PUBLIC NOTICE

In addition to the provisions in the following ordinance, the Nome Common Council recently approved a $100.00 fine (per occurrence) for failing to keep sidewalks shoveled and sanded. Therefore, if your property abuts a sidewalk, you must take every precaution to ensure that the sidewalk is safe for pedestrians. Various local contractors, such as Bering Straits Development Company, provide this service if you are unable to do it yourself. If you have any questions, you may contact the City Clerk's Office at 102 Division

(a) No person having the care, either as owner or occupant, of any premises bordered by a sidewalk, shall fail to remove any snow which may have fallen thereon, within a reasonable time thereafter.

(b) In the event that a person mentioned in the preceding subsection shall fail to keep the sidewalks adjoining his or her property reasonably clear of snow, the city may cause the snow to be removed from such sidewalk and assess the cost thereof against such premises at the rate of three dollars per front foot; such assessment shall be a paramount lien upon the premises against which it is assessed and may be collected and enforced as general taxes are collected and enforced and be subject to the same penalties and interest after delinquency as in the case of general taxes.

(c) A person whose snow has been so removed shall be mailed, by registered mail, a notice in writing by the city clerk, stating the time of removal and the cost of removal. Said notice shall state that if the owner does not appear and in writing object to said charge, the same shall be immediately assessed against his property by motion properly carried at the next ensuing council meeting. The lien shall attach from the date of passage of said motion and the same shall thereupon be entered on the assessment rolls of the city. No such motion shall be made within ten days of the mailing of said notice. (Ord. O-93-6-6 § 1 (part), 1994)

was at ease that he had made a mistake by not declaring a conflict on the vote. Uniform Rule 31 allows a legislator to rescind previous action of the body and subsequently change their vote or make a motion to be excused from voting. Herron stated during his interview, "And I figured that with my disclosure in the ethics filing of having a contract and the amount of the contract that - should I reconsider my vote so that I can put it on the record and I chose not to after talking to a legislator." The committee points out that Herron should have exercised the option to rescind his vote under Uniform Rule 31 and subsequently declare a conflict of interest. To fail to do so was a violation of AS 24.60.030(g).

The committee recommends no corrective action or sanctions as allowed under AS 24.60.178. The committee notes that Representative Herron paid a $5,000 fine for failure to file legislative ethics State contract disclosures for the first three years of his term and for failure to include State contract information on his Legislative Financial Disclosures for the year 2009, 2010, and 2011. Further, Representative Herron paid a civil penalty to the Alaska Public Offices Commission of $7,446 for incomplete LFDs for the calendar years 2009, 2010 and 2011.

Sullivan and Treadwell Endorse Tea Party on Credit Default

Sullivan statement rebuffed by national reporter and Washington Post

U.S. Senate candidates Mead Treadwell and Dan Sullivan joined Sen. Ted Cruz (R – Texas) and the Tea Party in efforts to jeopardize the full faith and credit of the U.S. government. Treadwell and Sullivan each issued statements criticizing a bipartisan solution to keep the federal government from default-

A credit default would have catastrophic impacts on the national economy by increasing credit card interest payments, mortgage payments and the average price for everyday utilities, food and gas. It would also severely impact the Alaska Permanent Fund.

"It is reckless for Treadwell and Sullivan to endorse the Tea Party's willingness to default on U.S. credit," said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party.

Dan Sullivan displayed a serious lack of knowledge about national financial issues in a statement which was immediately rebuffed as a "mischaracterization" by a leading national financial reporter. Sullivan's claim that the vote was a "blank check" reiterated debunked comments from Sen. Ted Cruz that the Washington Post called "falsehoods" and a "lie."

Mead Treadwell also criticized the vote, offering support for the position of Sen. Ted Cruz and other Tea Partiers who have claimed it is OK to default on U.S. credit.

Approximately half the Permanent Fund is held in stock investments and economic damage from a credit default could have devastating and unknown impacts on the Permanent Fund, as Alaska Business Monthly reported.

TAPS Throughput Committee Missing In Action

Oil production projected to decline after giveaway yet Senate TAPS Throughput Committee is not meeting Republican Senator Pete Micciche is acknowledging that the Senate's TAPS Throughput Committee hasn't even scheduled a meeting yet. Nearly a month into the legislative session, the committee hasn't met once to address projected declines in oil production.

"You'll be seeing a schedule in the next few weeks," Sen. Micciche said today at a press conference, suggesting that the session might be halfway over before the committee even meets.

"Apparently Republicans aren't concerned about declining production now that they've passed Parnell's Oil Giveaway, said Kay Brown, Executive Director of the Alaska Democratic

Last session, Oil Giveaway advocates used the TAPS Throughput Committee as a bully pulpit, meeting multiple times early in the session. The committee held hearings with Dan Sullivan, Bryan Butcher, Alaska Support Industry Alliance, Conoco Phillips, and others on January 22nd and February 5th of 2013. Yet the committee has not even scheduled a meeting this year.

Despite record oil company profits, record numbers of companies conducting exploration, and record oil sector employment under ACES, Giveaway advocates used the TAPS Throughput Committee to push the Governor's controversial Senate Bill 21. Now that S.B. 21 is law and Alaska has descended into billion dollar deficits, Giveaway advocates no longer express the same concerns about declining throughput.

Parnell's massive deficits have led the Legislative Finance Division to warn of cuts in the PFD or an income tax. House Republican leadership have said they are considering raiding the Permanent Fund to pay for Parnell's deficits. State deficits blew up after passage of Gov. Parnell's signature legislation, S.B. 21, better known as the Oil Giveaway. Though Parnell sold it as a tool to boost production, even his own administration projects declining oil production for at least the next decade.

Federal grant subsidizes small business energy efficiency audits in region

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Nugget is the first business in the region to receive a federally subsidized energy efficiency audit under a new grant program administered by the Bering Straits

A prioritized list of energy efficiency recommendations for the Nugget's historic office building and former print shop will go to Editor and Publisher Nancy McGuire when Robert Bensin of Bering Straits Development Co. completes the audit.

Each recommendation will include a cost estimate for implementing it and a payback estimate in energy cost savings within a time pe-

McGuire will decide the amount of money to invest in audit-recommended improvements based in part on the anticipated payback in energy

In November 2013 the Bering Straits Foundation received a USDA Rural Business Enterprise grant for $200,000 to provide commercial energy audits to 44 small businesses in the region.

The foundation handles grant payments, accounting and quarterly reports for the program.

Taz Tally of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy Advocates wrote the grant application and serves as grant manager, recruiting clients and implementing work on audits.

The Homer-based firm has delivered similar programs to more than 50 small businesses on the Kenai Peninsula.

Tally said he began to seek grant sources for small business energy audits because the Alaska Energy Authority's audit of his home prompted him to make energy upgrades that shaved 37 percent from his residential energy costs in one year. He said at that time the AEA did not perform small business energy audits, but the agency is doing so now.

Tally said clients in the AEA energy audit program pay $2,000 or more for an audit and are reimbursed after the audit has been completed.

payment Down reimbursable

Tally said seven clients have signed up for the foundation's energy audit program.

Each client makes a reimbursable down payment of $250-10 percent of the $2,500 audit.

The foundation will reimburse the down payment if the client upgrades for energy efficiency.

Bensin is developing a list of recommended businesses to implement upgrades, Tally noted. He said the USDA requires that qualified persons perform the audit-recommended improvements.

'We impose a down payment of $250 for a small business or nonprofit to qualify for an audit because for our first two programs on the Kenai Peninsula, we asked each business to confirm it would move forward and perform upgrades, but most did not," Tally explained. "The whole reason for the program is energy efficiency."

Upgrades partly bûrsable

A client who spends $6,000 or more for energy efficiency upgrades is eligible to apply to USDA Rural Energy for America for a grant to reimburse 25 percent of costs, but is not required to do so, Tally noted.

"The USDA will reimburse a minimum of $1,500 (25 percent of $6,000), so to apply for reimbursement a client must spend at least $6,000 for upgrades," Tally noted.

Talley said Christina Whiting of Energy Efficiency and Renewable Energy Advocates works with any client who wishes to apply for reimbursement, and she has guided about 50 applicants through the competitive reimbursement process. The assistance Whiting provides enhances the program's success because some small businesses are operated by just one or two individuals who don't have time to process a reimbursement request.

Audit program information

Efforts to disseminate information about the USDA energy audit program have included presentations to the Nome Rotary and Nome Chamber of Commerce, KNOM Radio broadcasts, advertisement in The Nome Nugget, and flyers distributed by the Alaska Village Electric Cooperative and Kawerak, Inc., Tally noted.

For more information and to find out if you qualify to receive one of the 44 audits, contact Moriah Sallaffie, executive vice president of Bering Straits Foundation at 443-4305, MSallaffie@beringstraits.com or Taz Talley at 907-435-7906, taz-board with a preliminary draft of the budget for the 2014-2015 school year.

Superintendent Steve Gast and business manager Paula Coffman outlined revenues and deficits as they begin the process of allocating and balancing the district's yearly funding.

Still in the draft stage, the proposed budget will take board and public comments before it is adopted later this spring.

Based on the formula provided by the state foundation, the district is budgeting for 695 students next year.

The calculations take into consideration not only the number of students in the district, but also which school they attend, special needs, required local contributions and the state's Base Student Allotment, which has yet to be determined by the legislature.

One unknown is whether the district will receive the governor's "one time funding" again, which last year was for transportation.

Another is whether the district will receive continued funding for the teacher positions it supports at Head Start and the Nome Preschool. Per the negotiated agreement with the Nome Education Association, ce

Police want to take a bite out of drug crime

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Police Chief John Papasodora has secured Nome Common Council approval to put more teeth into the department's effort to curb drug activity in Nome.

They are installing a K-9 program within the department.

K-9 unit? That means four-footed enforcement—a specially trained dog to work with the department on drug issues and also to be able to fill in on search and rescue efforts for added safety.

"This gives us a tool in the toolbox with which we can directly address the task," Papasodora told the Council.

"Hopefully we can cut down on the drug activity and increase what we can do"

Police Officer Jason Timm produced the proposal under which he will select and buy a police dog using his own money.

Timm would coordinate the purchase with Papasodora and Sgt. Scott Johnson, Alaska State Trooper, who is a recognized K-9 trainer and has experience in kennels and K-9 selection.

Papasodora backed and presented

NJUS board ponders Pilgrim power pact

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utilities System administration expects electric power coming into Nome from Pilgrim Hot Springs to be a 'go' or 'no go' proposition within 60 days.

That's what John K. Handeland, utility manager, told foot-draggers on the Nome Joint Utility Board at its meeting Feb. 20.

The board must decide by mid-April whether to sign a 20-year contract with Pilgrim Springs developers for the flat rate of 24 cents a kilowatt for the duration of the agreement.

Pilgrim Limited and Potelco have reported an "all systems go" pending negotiation and acceptance of an agreement to sell power to Nome, Handeland told the board.

Some questioned signing a contract of 20 years' duration.

Developers and scientists from University of Alaska Fairbanks have found that the operation would be capable of sending two to 2.3 megawatts of power into town.

Handeland expects to have an information packet in hand within two weeks that includes a detailed analysis for the utility board and Nome Common Council to consider.

A megawatt equals 1,000 kilo-

Negotiation started at 21 cents per kilowatt, Handeland said, but that was with an escalator to 48 cents a kilowatt.

The tentative agreement has Potelco responsible for building and maintaining the transmission line to town and linking it to the NJUS power plant.

Some NJUS board members expressed a want for caution in signing a contract as long as 20 years.

What if, asked Fred Moody, NJUS were locked into 24 cents a kilowatt and unforeseen events brought a gas

Letters

Dear Editor,

I am writing this letter concerning the needy people here in Elim. Not only in Elim but also all over the State of Alaska I presume. These are the people that do not qualify for food stamps and the money they receive for their work goes to their monthly bills like electricity, telephone, water and sewer, and other necessities and they end up having little or no money to get food from the store!

We need to find out some options about getting funding for these people. I've heard times are getting tough and it will get tougher as time goes by, according to the Bible. There's hardly any work here in Elim and other villages and those that have jobs are lucky to have them. I heard HUD is building some houses here this spring or summer and also Bering Straits Housing. But they are on hold till this summer.

We have exhausted my husband's unemployment benefits, but thankfully I'm back on disability benefits but that barely covers all of our bills. We got behind on our bills trying to help my daughter and her two kids and companion get food from the store, before they got their food stamps.

If there's some suggestions or possible funding from NSEDC or other business like the food bank, please let us know. We have applied for food stamps but I don't know how that will go.

We also need to think about where our souls will spend eternity, too. We have heard that Jesus is coming back soon and we need to think about where our souls will spend eternity.

Letters to the editor must be signed and include an address and phone number. Thank you notes and political endorsements are considered ads.

Big Money Has a Loud Voice

Money talks and big money shouts. We see TV ads touting "Vote No," "Vote Yes," "Tell Senator Whosit blah, blah, blah." The ads are loud with truth having many versions. When it gets to the end of the message it says who paid for the ad. That is the part that gets interesting because it zips by so fast that it nearly breaks the sound barrier. Ears can't hear that fast and eyes can't see who paid because the text is too small. Americans for Prosperity, sincere faces of various gas, oil and mining and other interests all have vested financial interests in promoting their causes. They pour millions into swaying our votes. They prey upon our ignorance and gullibility.

So, Let's figure who these fast-lipped advertisers really are. Who are Americans for Prosperity? Such a nice name. Well, they are big time multi-billionaires, the Koch brothers, who certainly don't live in Alaska. And really don't seem to care about us. They just want to control our politics. Oh, aren't they the same guys who closed the Flint Hills Refinery because of excess costs?

Freedom of expression is fundamental and the truth is so limiting. Big money has a big stick, but it is the ordinary citizen who controls the ballot box. It is our responsibility to educate ourselves and keep our hogwash detector fully functional. - N.L.M.-

I just thought I'd add that in. Well there is hardly any snow for the men to go hunt caribou also no money for gas. Something has to give soon.

Court Ruling on TAPS Vindicates Fired Assessor

Court decision reinforces accuracy of assessments by Marty McGee, who was fired by Parnell

ANCHORAGE: The Alaska Supreme Court just ruled in favor of Fairbanks, Valdez, and the North Slope Borough. The Supreme Court upheld a lower court's finding that oil companies have consistently attempted to undervalue the Trans-Alaska Pipeline in order to dodge their tax obligations to Alaska localities. The Supreme Court's decision comes on the heels of Gov. Parnell's decision to fire Marty McGee, an expert tax assessor who had challenged oil company efforts to undervalue the

"This Supreme Court decision shows that Parnell's firing of Marty McGee was politically-motivated and wrong for Alaska," said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party. "It is a good thing the courts are willing to take a hard look at data about TAPS, since Parnell has attempted to suppress it."

Courts have found that oil companies consistently have underestimated the value of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System (TAPS) in order to reduce their tax obligations to Alaska local governments. The companies even maintained two sets of books, one with the actual value of the TAPS and one with the one provided for tax purposes. Judge Sharon Gleason ruled that the companies undervalued the TAPS, as Marty McGee had noted in his work as an assessor.

Parnell has come under fire for other politically-motivated budgetary decisions and state hires. Parnell attempted to hold a classroom funding increase hostage to passage of a voucher resolution, but backed down under pressure. He also backed down from an apparent threat of retribution against Ketchikan for an education-related lawsuit. The administration was embarrassed by the hiring of an out-of-state judge, Paul Pozonsky, for a state job that required Alaska hire. Pozonsky is on trial for stealing cocaine while working as a judge in Pennsylvania, and the disappearance of cocaine evidence was public when the Parnell Administration hired him in Alaska.

Rep. Guttenberg comments on Supreme Court TAPS Property Tax decision

JUNEAU -Representative David Guttenberg (D-Interior/Wade Hampton) released the following statement in response to the Alaska Supreme Court decision upholding the fair assessed value of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System (TAPS) for local property tax purposes.

"This Supreme Court decision is monumentally important. The court has made it clear: it's about time the state starts living up to its Constitutional obligation to maximize the benefit to Alaskans from their natural resources. The governor needs to reverse course and stand up for Alaskans instead of giving their resource wealth

Dubious firm proposes Arctic port construction at Port Clarence

Last week, a company named Sea Pirate Mining Inc. sent a proposal to Governor Sean Parnell and Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell, as well as to the Alaska Congressional delegation, to construct a major deep-water port facility. Sea Pirate Mining posted a press release on their Facebook page saying that the proposal — if accepted — would "change the trajectory of Arctic sovereignty and global shipping issues..."

The company's website features a skull and bone flag, and the slogan "Arrr...Gold can try ...but it can't hide.

Sea Pirate Mining, Inc. proposes to have full oversight and management of the "totality of the project and specifically with the minimum dredging of an 18 nautical mile port channel that will be dredged to an average depth of 65 feet, by 2,500 feet wide; dredge to a depth of 65 feet, 110 square miles of bay, as to accept vessels as large as supertankers, while fully loaded."

The proposal says the total required dredging of the offshore approach channel and the bay of Port Clarence, will involve the removal of approximately 7,127,608,889 cubic yards of seafloor materials. "The spoils recovered from the dredging operations, once processed, will be used to expand the isthmus and raise the landmass to a general height of 25 to 30 feet above sea level," the document says.

Their ambitious plan envisions to turn Port Clarence into an industrial sized port for international marine traffic. "This port will also be the staging area for Arctic convoys for the international shipping community, marine research studies, commercial fishing and perhaps even special seasonal tourism tours, between the Pacific and Atlantic oceans."

The proposal also makes unrealistic claims of providing "complete marine services, such as: commercial ice breakers, escorts, salvage, environmental cleanup, SAR and pathfinding assistance and will be targeted with attempting to keep the Northwest Passage open, year round. This project also includes a new airport that will feature two (2) 11,000 foot runways, hangers [sic], floatplane terminal and heliport.'

And best of all, the company wants to build it all for free and not burden the taxpayer or the State of Alaska. The proposal, including misspellings of Bering Strait and referring to the Polar seas, continues to say "Strategically located less than 50 nautical miles from the Bering Straight [sic] (gateway to the Polar seas), this $3.6 billion (USD) project will be located at Port Clarence, Alaska. This project will far exceed the construction of the Suez and Panama Canal combined, in size, scope and offered services.

According to the plan's calculations, the project would require a minimum of five years of construction year round, 24/7, employing more than 800 skilled workers who will enjoy three-week Christmas holidays. However, the plan doesn't mention from where the workers would be recruited or housed. "No request has been made, nor are they planned, for appropriated funds from either the Federal or State of Alaska government for this effort," the proposal states. In return, the company just wants the mineral rights to the seabed they propose to dredge and unnamed industrial partners would pay the bills in exchange for reaping the benefits from a deepwater port.

Arctic storms intensify

The publication Science Daily reports that climate change intensifies Arctic storms.

Winter in the Arctic is the storm season when hurricane-like cyclones traverse the northern waters from Iceland to Alaska. These cyclones are characterized by strong localized drops in sea level pressure and as Arctic-wide decreases in sea level pressure are one of the expected results of climate change, this could increase extreme Arctic cyclone activity, including powerful storms in the spring and fall, scientists say.

A new study in Geophysical Research Letters uses historical climate model simulations to demonstrate that there has been an Arctic-wide decrease in sea level pressure since the 1800s.

'This research shows that the Arctic appears to be expressing symptoms expected from ongoing climate change," said Dr. Stephen Vavrus from the University of Wisconsin-Madison. "The long-term decline in atmospheric pressure over most of the Arctic is consistent with the response typically simulated by climate models to greenhouse warming, and this study finds a general corresponding increase in the frequency of extreme Arctic cyclones since the middle 19th cen-

Tracking changes in Arctic cyclone activity through time, Vavrus calculated a statistically significant, though minor, increase in extreme Arctic cyclone frequency over the study period, with increases strongest near the Aleutian Islands and Iceland. Dr. Vavrus suggests that, as of vet, the effect of climate change on Arctic cyclone activity has been minimal, but that future changes in polar climate will drive stronger shifts.

One relevant implication is that more storms mean more erosion of Arctic coastlines, especially in tandem with declines in buffering sea ice cover and increases in thawing coastal permafrost. "Erosion of Arctic coastlines has already been growing more severe during recent decades, and this study points to a contributing factor that will likely become an even more recognizable culprit in the future," said Dr. Vavrus.

The U.S. Navy prepares for operations in Arctic Ocean

In the coming decades, as multiyear sea ice in the Arctic Ocean recedes, previously unreachable areas may open for maritime use for a few weeks each year. This opening maritime frontier has important national security implications and impact required future Navy capabilities.

The Arctic Roadmap, updated from its original 2009 version, includes an implementation plan that outlines the Navy's strategic approach to developing capabilities to operate in the Arctic Ocean, and the ways and means to support the desired Department of Defense and National Strategy end states.

A task force assembled an interagency team of Arctic experts from various Navy offices, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the National Ice Center, the U.S. Coast Guard, and academia to develop a consensus assessment based on available predictions by climate scientists. The task force identified key missions the Navy should be expected to perform, such as maritime security (including support to the Coast Guard for search and rescue), sea control, freedom of navigation, and disaster response/defense support of civil authorities.

"As the perennial ice melts and open water is available for longer periods of time, we are committed to expanding our Arctic capabilities,' said Rear Adm. Jonathan White, Oceanographer of the Navy and TFCC director.

Given the vast distances and virtually no supporting infrastructure there, naval forces without specialized equipment and operational experience face substantial impediments. Naval operations in the Arctic Ocean require special training, extreme cold-weather modifications for systems and equipment, and complex logistics support.

Timm's proposal before the Council at its Feb. 24 meeting. The City's part of the bargain would be payment for training for Timm and the dog, including airfare, equipment, vet services and maintenance.

Papasodora asked the Council for $12,000 to pay for the K-9 program. The Council unanimously approved adding $12,000 to the general fund budget .

In return, Timm has agreed to a three-year commitment, after which he may remain with the City or relocate to another agency. Which ever way Timm decides, the dog would go with Timm who would also buy all the City-owned K-9 supplies at an agreed value upon termination.

Papasodora urged the Council to accept the proposal because, he said, it would give the police department an additional tool to detect and deter illegal drug operations, increase capacity for local search and rescue, and retain an experienced and capable officer for an additional three years. Papasodora said an additional goal would be to increase the department's public relations capacity.

The police dog would help out at points of entry for drugs—post office, airport and vessels. The K-9 program would be used in presentations at the schools, Adult Probation home visits, Airport Security checks and general drug searches.

Timm and the dog will be attending Rogers Academy in Huntsville, Ala. For approximately six weeks in March and April, the K-9 unit will train in first aide and safety, legal issues, narcotics overview, olfactory senses and detections, control, search (narcotics, area and building), obedience and scenario-based training.

Timm would receive an hour overtime pay and other consideration for taking care of the K-9, essentially a two-step salary increase to compensate Timm for care and expertise, according to Papasodora

The police department memorandum on the K-9 unit stresses that the K-9 officer will not be a bite dog.

"However, most dogs may bite if placed in a situation where they are in fear for their safety or their handler's safety," the proposal said.

In other business:

• At Councilman Stan Andersen's urging, Council backed off a resolution to support state Dept. of Transportation and Public Facilities Nome general aviation runway project until local users of Nome City Field could have a chance to utter an opinion.

"Do people with airplanes out there know we are doing this?" Andersen asked. "The state likes support on their local projects, but this is controversial," Councilman Tom Sparks said. The project would move Nome City Field onto airport property. Councilman Jerald Brown proposed to table the resolution for a month. The Council did not agree. But the main motion failed. Mayor Denise Michels reminded the Council that public hearings had been held in 2006 when the master plan came out.

• Heard Utility Manager John Handeland tell them that besides three small projects left from last year, that NJUS had not set up the 2014 summer work season plans pending news on federal and state water and sewer project money. "Once we know what is the potential from funding agencies, we can determine the summer work scope," Handeland said.

· Went around and around on ordering road sanding equipment as regards barge season and whether the money should come from this year's or next year's spending plans. The City's public works department has plans to replace their 1982 Ford dump truck which has been leaking a gallon of oil a day while in use. Andersen advocated saving the expenditure for budget year 2015 to reduce the amount the City would be taking from its savings to balance this year's budget. The City received three letters from citizens asking remedies for icy roads. "I don't think we should delay," Councilman Randy Pomeranz said.

 Passed five ordinances tweaking and torqueing this year's budget amendments.

• Once more delayed making a policy to follow for waiving fees for use of Nome's public facilities.

• Received a report from Handeland that NJUS is in negotiation with developers at the Pilgrim Hot Springs geothermal power project to achieve a 20-year contract for electrical power at around 24 cents per kilowatt. The company Potelco and scientists from UA Fairbanks have determined an availability of about two to 2.3 megawatts of power. Lining up the power purchase in a 20-year contract would be a hedge against the ongoing trend of rising fuel prices, according to Handeland.

Mayor Denise Michels noted the resignation of Ron Engstrom from the Nome Museum and Library Commission.

She thanked Engstrom for his many years of service. Engstrom served on the commission for almost 20 years.

Nome youth participate in urbanrural exchange program

By Kristine McRae

While Iron Dog racers and fans focused on the tricky trail from Big Lake to Nome to Fairbanks, a group of Alaska youth participated in an urban-rural exchange that had them hopping around the state in support of the world-class snowmachine race.

This year students from Anchorage and Nome represented the Iron Dog Urban-Rural Student Exchange Program.

An Iron Dog media release described the exchange as a way for students from both urban and rural communities to come together and collaborate on a single project while fully immersing themselves into another culture.

Mike Woods, who teaches at King Career Center in Anchorage, has been integral to the program since it began, in 2010. "It started with an idea that Cynthia Erickson from Tanana had," Woods said. "The idea was to rotate students from Anchorage with every school along the route. We've been to Tanana, Unalakleet, Galena and, now, Nome."

Woods approached Nome-Beltz

high school teacher Caleb Weaver as his partner teacher, and together they coordinated the activities and duties for the students. The two groups of five students each met in Big Lake to set up fencing, hang banners, and get the chute ready. Then they took it all down. "It was a lot of work," Weaver said, "but it was an opportunity for them to see how much they can do.

Different kids had different roles. Some were interested in the mechanics of the machines, others in the media side of things. There was something for everybody that was interesting, and I'm excited for their experience."

When weather prevented the Anchorage group from making it into Nome Tuesday evening as scheduled, they had to revise their plans. But Woods said that even delays and mechanical issues are part of the experience. "It shows us what a big state we really live in, and that things don't always go as planned, especially when it comes to travel.

"We aim to show the students that the Iron Dog is more than a race; that it's a prime example of how communities must come together and work with each other to pull off a unified goal. In this case it's a snow-machine race, but the principles they learn will apply to many circumstances the students are likely to face in their future," Woods said.

The group did make it to Nome in time for the halfway banquet, at which they served dessert. Before they left Nome again on Thursday they took a tour of Nome with Richard Beneville and visited Nome-Beltz and NACTEC with their Nome counterparts.

Both groups then traveled to Fairbanks to set up the finish line, prepare for the awards ceremony, and hand out awards. Weaver said he was impressed with his students and excited for their experience.

"I'm really proud of the maturity, flexibility, and work ethic of our Nome students Kara, Lacy, Hunter, CJ, and Keane.

Some days for this trip, they've worked all day, in the cold, on little sleep, with no breaks, and almost no food, yet they have done their jobs with enthusiasm."

pipeline to Nome with cheaper power? What if, Moody asked, the apparatus at Pilgrim failed, shutting down the 2 megawatts coming out of the hot springs? What if the flow of power does not start for five years, pushing the 24-cent kilowatt price to 25 years during which time sources of cheaper energy were found?

"I don't want to see us locked into a 20 years' contract," Moody said.

"It would be no foul for us if they are not successful. We would pay for power delivered," Handeland said.

"If fuel goes from the current $3.50 to $2, it would be a bad deal, but we also have to factor in wear and tear on our generators."

NJUS would continue to operate its diesel generators, Handeland said.

If wind or geothermal has a power

If wind or geothermal has a power interruption, "we need something to turn on and turn on immediately, "Handeland said.

"The two megawatts from geothermal at Pilgrim Hot Springs plus the potential power to be garnered from the NJUS wind farm on Banner Ridge would not meet Nome's peak demand for six megawatts," he said.

NJUS would always maintain a winter's volume of fuel, as it wouldn't be prudent to rely on anything else to get through the winter but diesel fuel, the panel agreed.

"Our diesel needs to be factored in. We need diesel to be responsible to the ratepayers," Willson said.

The price would be 24 cents, Handeland emphasized.

"If we're not able to commit for 20 years, it's a dead deal today," he said.

certified and support staff salaries will rise 2 percent, along with a 10 percent increase in health insurance. This year the district spent less on fuel and utilities than they had expected, but the projected cost increases in health insurance and salary benefits are prompting proposed cuts in other areas.

"The first place we went is to the district office as opposed to going to the teachers, which wouldn't effect the kids like taking a teacher out and increasing class size," Gast told the board. The district is looking to combine the Human Resources position or changing it to a classified (noncertified) position.

Also in the draft is the elimination of two aide positions at the elementary school and one special ed teacher at the high school. Staff development and travel went over budget this year, and the district is looking for ways to maintain vital professional development opportunities for teachers without going into debt. "It's a problem with a district our size; if you're constantly replacing ten percent of your teachers, you need to train them," Gast said, to which board member Barb Nickels added, "We have four new curriculums coming on board, and teachers are going to need to be trained."

A 13-member hiring committee interviewed six candidates for the elementary principal position and unanimously chose Paul Clark. "We offered and he accepted the position last Friday," Gast told the board.

Mr. Clark is currently the principal in Noorvik, in the Northwest Arctic Borough School district. His contract will start in early August.

State officials will visit Nome-Beltz High School on April 28 and 29 as part of the accreditation process. "One component of the visitation is we've opened up six days to give parents the opportunity to come in and visit classes," Nome-Beltz principal Scott Handley said. "The purpose is to give students exposure to see what it feels like to have visitors in the classroom."

Also scheduled for this year, the high school is updating and developing curriculum: the math curriculum will be brought before the board for adoption in March. More and more, lesson development includes targeting a variety of skills, such as combining language components with mathematics and art. "We have been working through a grant from Nome Eskimo Community to bring more culturally relevant activities and to teach essential writing and math skills," Handley told the board. To that end, the school is bringing a world-class kayak builder to Nome to construct a kayak with junior high students. The project will integrate essential writing and math skills, which meet state standards in those subjects.

Handley also acknowledged the city council for supporting the breakfast program at Nome-Beltz, which began in early February. The program provides fruit and snacks in the morning, and student response has been positive.

In his brief to the board, elementary school principal Bob Grimes reported that the Sixth grade had the highest average daily attendance for third quarter. In a campaign to boost school attendance, elementary students are given incentives for coming to school consistently and on

With the winter Measure of Academic Progress testing cycle complete the school is working on their Response to Intervention, which seeks to identify and provide assistance to children who are having difficulty learning.

"We're using data to start arranging students into reading and math,'

On March 3 the elementary school will celebrate the birthday of Dr. Seuss by participating in "Read Across America." Community members are invited to come read to the children, and students from the junior high will visit to recite selections from the Prose Out Loud project.

NPS Technology Director Robin Johnson shared some of the multimedia projects resulting from a recent competition that invited students to explore audio and video technol-

The presentations combined digital video, photos, stopgap animation, music, and narration. Kerry Ahmasuk, an eighth grader in Ms. Budd's class, used a time-lapse program set to accordion music. "I encouraged students to try to go beyond the free music libraries since those sound effects and music tracks are so ubiquitous," Budd said, "and a couple of students recorded the Eskimo dance groups drumming and singing." The Animation winner in the junior high category was Eric Handeland, for his stopgap animation based on a project on metaphors. At the elementary school, Kaitlyn Johnson created a movie about her experience as a Girl Scout for the "our community" cate-

The projects reveal an ongoing commitment to encourage students to combine academics, creativity, and technology. Tech director Johnson said she was pleased with the students' efforts and the help they received from their teachers. "A lot of work goes into these," Johnson said.

During the public comment portion of the meeting, Nome resident Sine Holly attempted to answer an earlier query from the board, which was to determine why some families choose to send their kids to Mt. Edgecumbe High School or elsewhere rather than have the students stay at Nome-Beltz. Holly described her experience moving from Bethel to Nome because "Nome was an excellent community to live in and raise my children." She then enumerated a number of examples that eventually led to her family's decision to send her children to boarding school. Her daughter, after transferring to Edgecumbe in Sitka her junior year, said, "The academics at Nome-Beltz high school were "ridiculously easy compared to Mt. Edgecumbe." Holly's son attended Nome-Beltz his freshman and sophomore years, "coming home with A's and B's, and his spelling was atrocious and he did no homework. I went to the counselor and was told I shouldn't worry. He transferred to Mt. Edgecumbe his junior year. His first progress report showed a D in US History. He told me, "My English skills are so poor, that I can't write comprehensive reports." And he was able to fix that.'

Holly described the difficulties surrounding sending her children away to school. "I swore I wouldn't send another child away to school, but this school district failed my child." She said the school discouraged her from having her youngest daughter tested for special ed services in elementary school. "I was told she just wasn't that smart, but that she was functioning at an acceptable level." In high school, her daughter expressed an interest in going elsewhere to school. "They don't treat me like I'm stupid, I might actually learn something here," she told her mother after visiting Galena. She eventually did go to Edgecumbe, and after one quarter Holly said her daughter passed the remainder of her High School Graduation Qualifying

During her address, Holly shifted to a broader, social commentary. "I think the failures of the high school are because of expectations, the kids are expected to do well or to fail, based on who their families are." She described a failure of academic and social structure. "The school does not prepare them for college," Holly said. "Basically Nome-Beltz has given up on the students. They allow certain students to get away with bullying. There's a pecking order that exists in our schools - the haves and have-nots. We're teaching our kids false values. We're teaching our kids it OK to tolerate favoritism.

Holly ended her address by acknowledging that, "despite this great societal divide, Nome has so many wonderful attributes. It's a great community, a generous and giving community. I personally believe we can fix our school district by beginning in our own homes. Ambition should be properly focused. We've got to teach and live with integrity, honesty, sharing, compassion, mutual esteem, respect and value for others. These values should be reinforced, taught, demonstrated throughout our school district."

In routine business the board approved the recommended contracts for tenured and non-tenured teachers, as well as a curriculum vendor list for the Nome Extensions Program. In not-so-routine business the board discussed concerns over vandalism and dangerous play at the school bus stops, in particular the stop on Front Street near the Aurora Inn. Barb Nickels said she has heard from several members of the community about property damage at the bus stop and at the nearby Northwest Campus, and she's had reports of students doing drugs inside the bus stop.

Nickels suggested having a monitor at the stop during pick up and drop off times. "I think need we need somebody to be at the stop. They're playing the game where they're pushing kids out in the street. It's a large bus stop," Nickels said. Although the bus stops are owned by the city, the school has in the past painted over offensive graffiti and fixed the huts.

Nickels also took a moment to clarify comments she made at the January 28 work session. "I stated that I wanted our new elementary principal to be able to read data, so that he would know our kids, and I just want folks to know that this was during a specific part of our meeting referring to a list of requirements and qualifications that could be quantified when we were reviewing our applications and it had nothing to do with personal qualities that we were looking for in a principal," Nickels

March 11 is the next scheduled school board meeting.

"If you are not interested in that, we need to tell them tomorrow," Handeland said.

Director Berda Willson wanted to see something in writing.

"I want to see all the pieces on the table," she said.

"We haven't seen anything. We can't throw in the towel. We need to see the towel," she laughed.

NJUS has been working with the city's attorney office to protect the City, utility and ratepayers, Handeland said.

Meanwhile, NJUS has been in touch with Cordova Electric, where the utility is using the Organic Rankine Cycle recovery to capture additional generator heat for electricity. NJUS has requested information on projected cost and savings achieved.

Handeland and a board member might go to Cordova to see the system in operation.

Following equipment upgrades and staff training, NJUS staff started adding fluoride to the municipal water system on Jan. 28. The amount going into the drinking water is 0.7 parts per million (ppm).

Handeland explained how Nome's level related to state and federal standards. The current federal standard sets the maximum fluoride level at 4.0 ppm. The current state standard sets the maximum at 2.0 ppm. In the past, Nome maintained the concentration between 0.8 ppm and 1.2 ppm. NJUS, following consultation with Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium and engineers has decided to use a conservative current standard averaging 0.7 ppm.

"This is lower than both federal and state standards, but in line with the level being used elsewhere in Alaska," Handeland told the NJUS board in his report. "This level is also consistent with proposed revisions to standards that the feds are considering, although they have not yet adopted these standards."

Handeland and board members gave Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. another round of thanks for contributing $500 of energy subsidy to eligible customers in the NSEDC communities. NJUS and NSEDC staff conducted a two-day signup session at Nome City Hall Feb. 11-13, and extended the signup opportunity to Feb. 20, according to Handeland.

"We took the initiative to call folks who did not come in and will review the list with NSEDC folks who may have been out of town, but otherwise eligible, during the enrollment period," Handeland reported.

JR. MUSHER — Nomeite Janelle Trowbridge completed her rookie race

APPROACHING THE FINISH LINE - Janelle Trowbridge nears the end of the Jr. Iditarod race.

Nome teen finishes Jr. Iditarod

By Diana Haecker

Last weekend, Jannelle Trowbridge of Nome finished her first Jr. Iditarod, crossing the finish line at Martin Buser's Happy Trails Kennel in Big Lake in sixth place.

Due to poor trail conditions, the Jr. Iditarod trail start and finish location was changed from Knik Lake to Happy Trails Kennel at Big Lake. The trail took the nine junior mushers from Big Lake to Yentna, where they had a 10-hour layover, and back the next day to Big Lake.

Conway Seavey, 17, won the 2014 Jr. Iditarod, with Ben Harper arriving only two minutes after Seavey at the finish line, on Sunday at 7:52 a.m.

Seavey won his second Jr. Iditarod championship title, after posting a win in 2012. Seavey is the grandson of Iditarod legend Dan Seavey, the son of two-time Iditarod champion Mitch Seavey and the brother of 2013 Iditarod champion Dallas Seavey.

Nomeite competes in 2014 Iditarod Trail Invitational

Janelle Trowbridge of Nome was the first girl to cross the finish line, a distinction that got her a special prize: a fur hat made by Libby Riddles, the first woman to have won the Iditarod.

Jannelle said she ran the dogs out of her family's kennel in Nome that she trained herself. While training began in August, this winter's lack of snow and the dismal icy conditions didn't prove conducive to run dogs. "We had only one and a half weeks of training on sled and then we went to Bethel," she said. Her father Rolland Trowbridge ran as a rookie in the Kusko 300, finishing in last place.

One and a half weeks before the Jr. Iditarod Jannelle flew her 12 of her dogs to the Mat-Su Valley to train with fellow Nomeite Melissa Owens, who now lives in Wasilla. Icy conditions forced them to truck their dogs to the Chugiak race track, where at first, Jannelle said, she and the dogs had to get used to navigating trails lined by trees, as they were only used to the open tundra of Nome.

Having run dogs as a family endeavor since 2011, Jannelle said, the Jr. Iditarod never came up until last year. "My dad asked me if that was something I wanted to do and I said 'Yes!'," Jannelle remembers.

Since the Trowbridges first bought a team of Greenlandic Huskies, they added on by acquiring dogs that are bred for faster traveling. Jannelle said she put down a chunk of her own money to buy dogs from Iditarod veteran Vern Halter of Jannelle said she had a blast during the Jr. Iditarod, wanting to do it again next year. Except for one spot of some overflow, the trail was in good condition, she said. Being a rookie, she also learned the importance of patience. Jannelle described that she and fellow musher Andrew Nolan raced each other on the run back to Big Lake, which involved a lot of passing and re-passing. This racing back and forth may have taxed her dogs, allowing Nolan to pass her and build a 20-minute lead to the finish line. "If I were to change anything, I would time it better and stay behind him longer," said Jannelle in retrospect.

Jannelle is an 11th grade student at Nome-Beltz High School. She finished the Jr. Iditarod race two hours and 21 minutes after Jr. Iditarod Champion Conway Seavey. She said she'd like to race the Jr. Iditarod again, hopefully ending up in the top 5. "They really have cool trophies for the top 5," Jannelle said, laughing.

Nome hosts Norton Sound Shootout basketball game

By Sarah Miller

Nome-Beltz hosted a three-day regional basketball tournament last week, welcoming teams from Chevak, Shishmaref, Gambell, Brevig Mission, and Barrow. Games began on Thursday afternoon, with Nome's JV girls and boys teams competing against Gambell. The Nanooks boys won their game in overtime by one point, 55-54. On Friday, the boys and girls teams from Chevak played their first games, against Shishmaref (boys) and Brevig Mission (girls), winning both and beginning a streak of victory that would carry them to first place in the tournament. Chevak's boys team wins were all in close scoring games: Chevak over Shishmaref (59-56); Chevak over Nome (48-45); and Chevak over Gambell (56-51). With its 53-51 win over Nome on Saturday, second place in the tournament went to Shishmaref. The all-tournament team honors were given to Ian Booth (Nome), David Ollana (Shishmaref), Elija Matchian (Chevak), Wallace Ungwiluk (Gambell), and John Night of Chevak, who was also named MVP. Keegan Bourdon of Nome was the free throw champion.

On the JV girls' side, the team from Chevak was undefeated in its games against Brevig Mission (72-30), Nome (53-23), and Gambell (39-23). Gambell, defeating Nome (59-40) and Brevig Mission (58-45), was awarded second place in the tournament. Nome's JV Lady Nanooks won over Brevig Mission on Saturday, 33-26. Sarah Campbell of Gambell won the title of Free Throw Champion, and the JV girls all-tournament team included Ashley Tobuk of Nome, Kristina Apassingok of Gambell, Tia Machian and Reanna Tulim of Chevak, and Helen Bruns of Brevig Mission. Tulim was named MVP.

At the evening games on Friday and Saturday, Nome's varsity team faced its conference rival, the Barrow Whalers. Coming off their victory over Barrow at the previous weekend's Valdez Elks Tournament, and holding the home court advantage, the Nanooks started out in control of the game through the first quarter. Coach Pat Callahan stated in an email, "Nome got important contributions early in the game from all six seniors and that was a real key to our victory. Jake Stettenbenz had an early steal and layup that I thought really set the tone in the first quarter." Barrow answered the challenge with a number of three-point shots, and the Nanooks slipped be30. Nome began the third quarter on a high note with free throws and a three-point shot by Klay Baker, but Barrow's three pointers continued to pose a problem for the Nanooks, who fell behind again by the end of the third period. In an exciting final quarter, successful rebounds and free throw shots helped Nome climb back on top, leading 66-65 with 45 seconds left to play. Daniel Head's free throw added one point, and then the Whalers tried to run out the clock and missed their final basket. Cass Mattheis sank two free throws with 3.8 seconds to go, and victory went to Nome, 69-65. Tyler Eide scored a career high of 34 points in the game, and Mattheis scored 8 of his 16 points in the final quarter alone. Callahan also noted the contributions of seniors Briar Dickson and Eli Johnson. As this game was preceded by the Senior Night Ceremony, the victory was especially meaningful for the graduating students on the team. Callahan introduced the students by reading an autobiographical statement from each. themes among the seniors' statements included appreciation for the support of family members, coaches, and teammates, particularly those who challenged and encouraged the players to better themselves on and off the court. Seniors Cass Mattheis, Eli Johnson, Tyler Eide, Briar Dickson, Jake Stettenbenz, and Matt Tunley described their teammates as cohesive, supportive, fun, and en-Mattheis wrote, "I couraging. wouldn't trade anyone on the team," while Tunley expressed that he has loved being part of the team and has cherished every moment. The Senior Night Ceremony also presented graduating students from the Pep Band and Cheerleading Squad. Ron Horner, the band director, introduced six students, two of whom (Ariana Horner and Tamaira Tocktoo) were absent due to their scheduled basketball game in Barrow. Dawn Wehde, Bruce Landry, Andrea Irrigoo, and Sara Clark were joined by family members and friends as they were recognized for their dedication and contribution to the pep band. Horner stated, "These students represent many years playing, and many hours of practice to add fun and energy to sports events.' Cheer coach Abby Baltz presented the only senior on this year's cheerleading squad, Gwendalyn Trigg-Komakhuk, who has brought a "delightful, great attitude" during her three years on the team. The ceremony was a heartfelt expression of pride and gratitude on behalf of the graduating students, their families, and their coaches and directors.

Saturday's game against Barrow resulted in another victory for the home team, 51-40. Callahan stated, The Saturday night game was played more at the pace that we prefer." Despite having to play without the leadership of Tyler Eide, who was benched for foul trouble, the Nanooks' defense rose to the occasion and carried the team to a win. Mattheis, Eide, and Baker were the top scoring players, with 18, 16, and 10 points respectively. Callahan commented, "Barrow is a very good team. Lawrence Kaleak is a firstteam all-conference performer.' Nome is likely to face the Whalers in the first round of the upcoming Western Conference tournament, and will spend its off-weekend preparing for the challenge.

Meanwhile, the Lady Nanooks traveled to Barrow for their last season games before the Western Conference Tournament in Anchorage, March 6-8. Nome was defeated in both games. Friday's score was 74-63, with Ariana Horner contributing 28 points, followed by Addy Ahmasuk with 17 and Senora Ahmasuk with 16. Barrow's Rose Mongoyuk scored 29 points. The second game was a bit closer, with the final score at 47-37. Horner, Addy and Senora Ahmasuk were again top scoring players for Nome, with 18, 12, and 7 points. The Lady Nanooks will also spend the next weekend preparing for the Western Conference Tournament in Anchorage. Seeding and brackets should be available Tuesday or Wednesday of this week, stated

NOME SKI AND BIATHLON TEAM "HEADS FOR THE HILLS" — Many older Nomeites say it's been over 30 years since they have seen as poor a snow year as we are having in 2014. This is by far the lowest snow coverage in the 12-year existence of the Nome Ski and Biathlon Team. The snow has been so bad in their usual Gold Hill ski area that the team has taken to transporting its members up to the flanks of Newton Peak for practice. The upside of the situation is that team members are getting proficient at skiing hills, something that just can't be done on the flats north of town. The new skills will be put to the test in March as the team heads to Koyuk for an invitational meet, to White Mountain for the Regional meet, and to Fairbanks for the rural state meet.

Carpal Tunnel Syndrome: It's all in the wrist

By Rob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Carpal tunnel syndrome is a common cause of wrist pain and hand numbness. It is caused by damage to a large nerve, called the median nerve, that passes through a tight tunnel in the wrist formed on the top by a strong band-like ligament stretching across the palm side of the wrist and on the bottom by the eight carpal bones surrounding the back side of the wrist.

The location of the carpal tunnel is easy to identify making a fist and slightly flexing the wrist. On the palm side of the wrist you will notice several creases crossing from the thumbside to the pinky-side. Two of these creases will be more prominent. You may also notice several tendons running lengthwise down the forearm stand out as they near the wrist. Just underneath these tendons is the large median nerve running in the same direction through the carpal tunnel.

Anything that puts pressure on the median nerve at this location in the wrist will eventually cause the classic symptoms of carpal tunnel syndrome. Other common causes include activities that require gripping or repetitive wrist-twisting, extended periods of typing, and sleeping with the wrists flexed.

People with diabetes, rheumatoid arthritis, obesity, kidney disease, or thyroid problems have an increased cause these conditions cause swelling of the tissues within the tunnel. Symptoms may also flare temporarily in women who are pregnant or in women taking oral horfor contraception menopausal symptoms.

Sometimes it is hard to tell the difference ALASKA tween carpal tun-FAMILY nel syndrome and other causes of DOCTOR wrist pain like arthritis, tendonitis, trigger finger, or a pinched nerve in the neck. True symptoms of carpal tunnel include: numbness in the thumb, pointer finger, and ring finger; weakness in the thumb; pain in the wrist sometimes radiating up the forearm; or trouble gripping objects. Your doctor can perform a brief physical exam to help distinguish between the various causes of wrist pain.

Over time, without treatment, injury to the median nerve as it passes through the carpal tunnel leads to irreversible damage to the muscles of the thumb and first two fingers. This damage makes it increasingly difficult to grip objects or manipulate tools.

Once symptoms have been present for several weeks, doctors may order special nerve conduction studies to determine the extent of injury to the median nerve and rule out other problems.

lease the tight ligament over the carpal tunnel in order to take pressure off the median nerve. However, before surgery is required, there are four primary ways to treat, and possibly eradicate, the symptoms conservatively:

First, a wrist splint should be worn to prevent excessive flexion or extension of the wrist during sleep or activity requiring repetitive wrist motion. These splints may be purchased over-the-counter, online, or from a local medical supply source.

Second, ibuprofen or naproxen sodium should be used to reduce inflammation and ease pain of the wrist and fingers. Similarly, an ice bath or cold pack applied to the wrist for 15 minutes at a time will serve the same purpose.

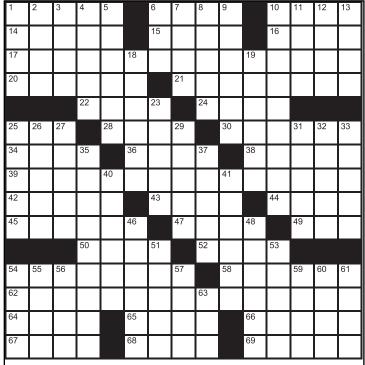

Third, ultrasound therapy as part of physical therapy, repeated over several weeks, has been shown to relieve symptoms in select patients.

Finally, if conservative therapy fails to reduce symptoms, doctors may recommend a corticosteroid injection directly into the carpal tun-This procedure is often performed in the office. When combined with splinting, a steroid injection has been found to provide better relief than any one treatment alone short of surgery.

Prevention of carpal tunnel syndrome is always preferred. The best prevention is to ensure work with the hands, including typing, is performed with the wrists held straight. Athletes and laborers should avoid in a flexed or extended position when weight training or working with heavy objects. And people prone to sleeping with bent wrists, should try sleeping with splints or with the hands held straight under a pillow.

Growing up she had a very special bond with each of her siblings. When together she and Cindy shared happiness and laughter, countless times all they had to do was look at each other and the laughter would begin.

Throughout Diane's short life she had a very loving and selfless nature. She would put the needs of others before her own. When asked for help she did so willingly and without hesitation.

In June 2002, Diane gave birth to her oldest daughter, Helga Audrey "Dolling" Takak whom she shared with her uncle Oscar and Joyce Takak of Elim. Dolling grew up knowing that she had two families and held a very special place in her mom Diane's heart. Her oldest son Tristan was five months old when Diane graduated from the Frank A. Degnan High school in Unalakleet. Together she and Francis Ivanoff shared the lives of their three children. Tristan, Kianna and Jordan.

Diane attended the Della Keats traditional healing classes, certified nurse training at NACTEC, worked as a dispatcher for the Unalakleet Police Department, a cashier for the UNC garage, Norton Sound Seafood Products. Her pride and joy was as a stay at home mom with her beautiful children.

Diane enjoyed picking berries and loved to bake blueberry delight and blueberry buckle with the berries she picked. Her mom Ellen taught her how to make delicious homemade bread and fritters. She was also the agutak maker in the family. She loved the great outdoors, whether it be boating, walking or riding. One of Diane's favorite pastimes was taking walks with her kids and friends. While walking, cooking or cleaning Diane loved to listen to music.

She is survived by her children Tristan 7, Kianna 3, and Jordan 10 months, parents Joseph, Jr. and Ellen, siblings Jennifer, Joe III, Marie, Bana, Cindy and Jeffrey. Diane will be greatly missed by all of us. We find comfort in knowing she is now an angel watching over us. Peace to her memory.

Celebrating the end of an era

JUNEAU - The Alaska State Museum in Juneau will close at the end of February to make way for Phase- 2b of the new State Libraries, Archives and Museum (SLAM) building being constructed on the existing museum site.

All of Juneau and the museum's statewide community – former as well as current - friends, volunteers, and staff are invited to a farewell gathering, hosted by The Friends of the Alaska State Museum, from 5 to 9 p.m. on Friday, February 28 – the very last day the museum will be open to the public.

Erected in 1967, the Alaska State Centennial Museum building was one of many projects in Alaska celebrating the centennial of the purchase of Alaska from Russia. The building—nicknamed the "Million Dollar Museum"—was designed by architect Linn A. Forrest and funded in part by the first-ever sales tax approved by the citizens of Juneau to house the State's treasures that had been collected since 1900. Since that time, the collection has grown from 5,500 objects and specimens to more than 32,000 —mostly donations from Alaskans. Almost fifty years later, the preservation of and access to this large public collection requires an expanded facility.

After closing, and once the museum's collection has been safely relocated to the new secure vault now under construction, a few of the 30-foot tall cast concrete panels with a stylized flicker feather design that clad the building will be carefully removed, and the building will be demolished to make way for a grand new facility. In the new state-of-the art facility, the museum will be joined by the Alaska State Archives and State Library including the Historical Library, and will open to the public in April, 2016. The 118,000 square foot facility will feature museum galleries, a large 125-seat multi-purpose

Fallout continues: Koch Bros forced to pull ad, Dan Sullivan and Mead Treadwell still refusing to criticize Koch Brothers' decision to fire 80 Alaskan refinery workers

The Koch Brothers were planning to spend over a hundred thousand dollars in Alaska on a new ad propping up Republican Senate candidates like Dan Sullivan and Mead Treadwell, but after taking heat for firing 80 Alaska workers and closing the Koch Industries owned Flint Hills Refinery in North Pole, Alaska, Koch Brothers-backed Americans for Prosperity suddenly pulled their ads from the Alaska airwaves. It took two weeks, but the billionaire Koch Brothers finally realized that Alaskans won't buy the argument that the Kochs have to fire 80 Alaska workers and close a refinery due to "excessive costs" while at the same time spending over a hundred thousand in Alaska on misleading political attack ads.

While the Koch Brothers pulled their ads, Dan Sullivan and Mead Treadwell have vet to take a position on the Koch Brothers' decision to fire 80 Alaskan workers. Last week, Sullivan was back home in Washington, DC to rub shoulders with lobbyists to raise money to battle in the contentious Alaska Republican primary, and had nothing to say to the 80 Alaskans who are losing their jobs because the Kochs feel it's too expensive to keep them employed. Mead Treadwell has also remained silent on the issue over the past two weeks.

"Dan Sullivan and Mead Treadwell have willfully benefited from the Koch Brothers' millions aimed at propping up Republican Senate candidates across the country, but after two weeks they still refuse to criticize the Kochs for their decision to fire 80 Alaska workers," said Justin Barasky, a spokesman at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "It's clear that the Koch Brothers couldn't care less about Alaskans and are only interested in buying themselves a U.S. Senator that will do their bidding for them in Washington. Dan Sullivan and Mead Treadwell owe Alaskans an answer as to why they're fine with the Koch Brothers fighting for them while hurting Alaska families."

By pulling their ads, the Koch Brothers have finally realized that they have zero credibility with Alaskans. Late last year, the New York Times reported Koch Brothers funded Americans for Prosperity was caught using a Maryland actress to claim that she can't "trust" Mark Begich.

House clears up Dept. of Labor wage and hour reg confusion Thompson's HB276 enshrines long-held motor vehicle sales industry practice for commissioned employees

The Alaska House of Representatives Feb. 19 passed a bill clearing up confusion in recently-adopted state wage and hour law relating to commissioned motor vehicle employees.

House Bill 276, sponsored by Rep. Steve Thompson, clarifies the long-standing employment practices of the automobile industry by maintaining a commissioned based employments system for automobile salespersons, finance personnel and service writers in statute. Unfortunately, "straight commission" has become defined as a fixed percentage of the gross sale. Automobile dealers pay commission on the net of the sale, since unlike realtors, automobile dealers must pay to purchase of the vehicle prior to anyone being paid.

"The current system works well for both employees and employers, and the department has been helpful in drafting this fix by amending their regulations," Thompson, R-Fairbanks, said. "However, it is necessary to enshrine this in statute to clarify the law as best we can."

HB 276 now moves to the Alaska Senate for consideration.

Senate Says No to Federal Encroachment with SJR 15 Senator Giessel's resolution opposes creation of international park

JUNEAU—the Alaska State Senate unanimously passed a resolution sponsored by Senator Cathy Giessel (R-Anchorage Hillside/Turnagain Arm/N. Kenai) that opposes continued federal overreach in Alaska. Senate Joint Resolution 15 urges the federal government to cease pursuing the creation of the Beringia International Park or any other international designations identified through the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

This Bering Strait-region proposal is currently progressing via a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) written by representatives of the Russian government and our then United States Secretary of State Hilary Clinton, present Secretary of State John Kerry and the National Park Service.

This Beringia Transboundary area, spanning from eastern Russia over to northwestern Alaska, attempts to bond Russian and northwestern Alaska cultures together, recognizing their subsistence lifestyles and historic geographic, archaeological and cultural ties.

'While I embrace the cultural, historical and archaeological bonds between people in the Bering Strait area, what I don't support is another layer of federal bureaucracy and regulation that will come along with the creation of an international site,' said Senator Giessel.

Alaska's United States Senator Lisa Murkowski, Congressman Don Young, as well as Governor Sean Parnell have all outlined their concerns regarding this designation to no avail or consideration. Consequently, the plan continues to move forward without regard to or input from Congress or the State of

"While this MOU has yet to be signed by the President, the planning and execution has been advancing over the years, quietly, without any efforts to coordinate or consult the state of Alaska or with Congress, and I find that unacceptable," said

SJR 15 strongly urges the federal government pause this process, consult the State of Alaska for this park designation and any further federal or United Nations designations in the future and that their creation require both the approval of the United States Congress and the Alaska State Legislature.

Senator Gardner urges administration to pursue Exxon's full remediation for spill damages

Resolution urges ExxonMobil to honor commitments under "re-opener for unknown injury" provision

JUNEAU -Senator Berta Gardner (D-Anchorage) introduced SJR 25, a resolution urging the Alaska Department of Law along with the US Department of Justice to file a motion to collect $92 million plus interest from Exxon to honor their commitments to Alaska.

"The Exxon Valdez Oil Spill Trustee Council indicates that only 13 of the 32 monitored resources injured by the spill are recovered or very likely recovered. This is an unacceptable recovery rate, 25 years after the worst environmental catastrophe our state has ever seen," stated Senator Gardner.

In 2006, under the Murkowski administration and Bush administration, the state and federal government jointly presented Exxon with a "Comprehensive Plan for Habitat Restoration Projects Pursuant to the Reopener for Unknown Injury" to remediate lingering oil in intertidal sediments along the shoreline of effected coastline in Alaska.

Technological improvements in sub-surface oil contamination remediation have made great progress. Honoring past financial commitments from the 1991 settlement would allow sub-surface remediation work to continue by the state and federal governments, which are currently 6 years behind schedule on this important work.

Treadwell/Sullivan abortion initiative before Supreme Court

Alaska Supreme Court will decide on constitutionality of intrusive abortion regulation

ANCHORAGE: The Alaska Supreme Court is hearing oral arguments on a challenge to an intrusive women's health regulation supported by Senate candidates Mead Treadwell and Dan Sullivan.

"Mead Treadwell and Dan Sullivan put their own political ambitions ahead of young women's safety with their support of this invasive regulation," said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party.

The regulation would require minors to notify their parents before obtaining an abortion, which endangers minors who are victims of parental domestic violence. Mead Treadwell was one of the top donors in support of the regulation when it was put forward as a ballot initiative in 2010, and Treadwell hosted the Election Day party for initiative supporters at his house. At the time, Sullivan was Attorney General, and said that the initiative was legal under Alaska's Constitution, which is the issue that now will be decided by the state Supreme Court.

Both Treadwell and Sullivan have opposed a woman's right to choose and contraception access. Treadwell has said he believes "life begins at conception." Treadwell touted he was "proud to sign" Alaska's new, legally questionable regulations telling women what constitutes a medically necessary abortion. Treadwell certified the regulations as Lieutenant Governor. Meanwhile, Sullivan would allow employers to deny contraceptive coverage to their employees.

Conference committee recommends re-authorizing AR-DORs

HB71 report re-ups AK economic development orgs thru 2016, next stop floors

Regional Development Organizations, or ARDORs, got new life after the House-Senate Conference Committee on House Bill 71 agreed to re-authorize the program through July 1, 2016.

The committee, which met following disagreement between House and Senate versions of the bill, sponsored by Rep. Shelley Hughes, R-Palmer, agreed to strip language inserted earlier by the Senate relating to weathervane scallops. The new committee substitute will re-enact the vessel-based limited entry fisheries system for Bering Sea hair crab through December 30,

"I am happy to see that both bodies worked together to resolve differences to allow the ARDORs to continue their important economic development work across Alaska," Hughes said. "Economic development is pivotal to job growth and healthy communities. Our ARDORs are the local connection to businesses to foster economic success.'

Hughes' original bill only extended ARDORs with new accountability requirements, but the Senate added sections on hair crab and scallops. The new report includes transition language allowing the previous ARDOR program to continue until new regulations are adopted.

ARDORs were created in 1988, based on the premise that the best strategy is a locally-driven initiative where local leaders understand regional conditions, challenges and opportunities and engage in partnerships and projects to support regional economic development.

"We talk about our economy and the three-legged school of oil revenues, federal, and all the others. Well, right now that stool is wobbly, and ARDORs offer a way to help solidify that base," Hughes said. "AR-DORs promote economic diversity and I'm hopeful the new standards will help prove that out."

The full House and full Senate now needs to act to accept the conference committee substitute to HB 71 before it can be sent to the governor for signature.

Senator Wielechowski introduces legislation protecting Alaskans who defend our rights

Feb. 19 Senator Bill Wielechowski (D-Anchorage) introduced legislation protecting Alaskans who sue the state to safeguard the rights of all Alaskans.

In 2003, former Governor Murkowski signed a law which restricts Alaskans' ability to sue the state on behalf of their fellow citizens. The 2003 law allows winners of "public interest litigation" to collect attorney's fees from those who lose, even if the losing party was simply defending the rights of all Alaskans. No other state has a comparable law. Under the proposed legislation, those who file frivolous lawsuits would still be liable for attorney fees.

"Alaskans who seek to protect our rights and defend against government overreach and intrusion should be applauded, not punished," said Senator Bill Wielechowski. "The 2003 law is an attempt to scare those who dare to stand up to government. It runs counter to the intention of our Founding Fathers and every democratic principle, and must be repealed."

Recently former First Lady Bella Hammond, who is 80, and constitutional drafter and former Senator Vic Fischer, 89, acted as public litigants in a lawsuit against the Department of Natural Resources. They joined two Native elders and a group of Native villages seeking to protect the headwaters of the world-class Bristol Bay fishery.

"Bella Hammond and Vic Fischer have spent their lives serving Alaska," Wielechowski added. "The Governor's recent pursuit of half a million dollars in legal fees from their co-plaintiffs – a group of small Native villages in western Alaska- is government overreach at its worst. Public interest litigants should be protected and not fearful of losing their homes and life savings for standing up for our rights. I call on Governor Parnell to stop trying to intimidate Alaskan heroes and protect them and other brave

Gara to KABATA, Susitna Hydro: Stop Spending Public Money to Promote Unsanctioned Projects

Limited state funds should go to pri-orities, not lobbying voters on megaprojects the Legislature has

JUNEAU – In letters sent Feb.19 Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) called on the governor and the Knik Arm Bridge and Toll Authority (KABATA) to stop spending public funds promoting their projects before the public or legislature has sanctioned the project.

"The state has no place lobbying the public on projects the Legislature hasn't approved," said Gara. "It's fair to debate the merits of these projects, and the projects should be decided based on those merits. The public shouldn't have to pay for expensive glossy brochures to lobby themselves."

According to a Legislative Research Services report, KABATA spent over $58,000 on print, radio, and internet public outreach over the last 31 months. The same report shows the Susitna-Watana Hydroelectric Project spent $71,000 publicizing its website and printing and distributing a full color, two-page newspaper insert.

In the letters, Gara states: "I would ask that no further public funds be used to purchase general media advertisements promoting this project until it is fully approved by the Legislature. With a deficit of roughly $1 billion or more, and dwindling savings accounts and oil production (projected by the state to fall by 45% over the next 10 years), the Legislature may decide this project is not a priority over reversing cuts in public education, or other priorities.'

"Governor Parnell is pursuing building the Knik Arm Bridge using state funding, giving up on years of promises that the bridge would be funded by the private sector. With Department of Transportation officials warning of further belt-tightening, dock repairs in Akutan, bridge repairs in Tok, repairs to the Haul Road, or safety improvements to the Seward Highway shouldn't have to compete with the thousands of dollars KABATA has spent on public relations and lobbying," said Bob French, a Government Hill resident and former president of the Government Hill Community Council. "Projects need to be chosen on their needs and merits, not who's got the biggest advertising budget.'

School safety: Democrats introduce bills to create School Zones around all schools

All students deserve the same safety precautions

JUNEAU - Feb. 21 House Democratic Leader Chris Tuck and Senator Berta Gardner introduced legislation to require school zone markings at all school locations, in an effort to slow traffic and improve students' safety in the vicinity of a Currently, municipalities are not required to create school zones around private, charter, or religious schools. Under the legislation, a municipality would have the discretion to place signs, speed zones, lights or other measures appropriate for the location.

"It's basic common sense", said Gardner (D-Anchorage). "Drivers should be alerted wherever children are present in large numbers and at

Tuck and Gardner introduced the legislation (HB317 and SB179) in response parents and charter and private schools expressing concern over the speed of traffic around these

"The safety and well-being of all Alaska's children should be our top priority. School zones are essential regardless of the type of school or the funding it receives. Charter schools are public schools and it is shocking that Alaska doesn't already require mandatory school zones to be in place around charter school buildings," said Joey Eski, chair of the Academic Policy Committee for Aquarian Charter School.

This bill would also require a sign indicating these school zones are drug free school zones.

Republicans condemn Koch refinery closure - Treadwell/Sullivan silent

Treadwell/Sullivan candidates won't criticize their benefactors, the Koch

ANCHORAGE: Alaska Republicans continue to criticize the closure of Flint Hills refinery, which is owned by the Koch brothers. In contrast, neither Mead Treadwell nor Dan Sullivan — beneficiaries of the Koch-funded attack ads against Senator Begich - have said anything about the closure of Flint Hills, the lost jobs, or contaminated drinking

"Why won't Mead Treadwell and Dan Sullivan comment on the closure of Flint Hills refinery? Either they have no clue what's happening in Alaska or they're afraid the Koch brothers will stop spending on misleading ads attacking Mark Begich if they speak up in defense of Alaskans," said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party and resident of Fairbanks.

The Koch brothers fired 80 Alaskans by closing the Flint Hills refinery. They pulled over $100,000 in attack ads set to run the same week they closed the refinery.

Minnick/Olstad win 2014 Iron Dog

By Diana Haecker

Notching their second victory of the Iron Dog as a team, Todd Minnick and Nick Olstad, both of Wasilla, drove their Polaris snowmachines across the Fairbanks finish line on Saturday, at 12:09 p.m.

Second to reach the finish line were 2012 and 2013 Iron Dog champions Marc McKenna of Anchorage and Dusty VanMeter of Kasilof, arriving at 12:31 p.m.

Thirty minutes later, team #10, Mike Morgan of Nome and Chris Olds of Eagle River, crossed the finish line in third place. They had hoped for victory, especially since the race seemed to be going well for Morgan and Olds were the first team to reach the halfway checkpoint of Nome, earning them a $10,000 contingency prize. On Wednesday, when the competitors gathered in the Public Works Garage to perform timed repairs, Morgan and Olds, aided by fellow racer Shane Barber and Nome's Evan Booth, took only 14 minutes to do repair and maintenance on their Polaris machines. In shape from logging 3,500 miles during training, their bodies were not even sore from the bumpy ride that took them along the Iditarod Trail from Big Lake to Nome.

Morgan and Olds were again the first team to leave Nome on Thursday at 8 a.m., racing off into the clear, cold and still dark morning. The two picked their way through challenging trail conditions along the coast. "The trail between White Mountain and Nome was the worst part of the entire race," said Mike Morgan. He described the trail conditions through the Topkok Hills as "real bad." But still, the duo just took it reasonably slow, up and down those hills. At the coast heading south, they blazed a trail between Koyuk and Shaktoolik on the ice and raced all the way to Kaltag, where they took their first layover after the coast. That trail had been hammered by all the snowmobile racers and didn't improve.

Still, everything seemed to be going well for team #10, but in Kaltag, Morgan already felt the wear and tear of the rough trail on their machines. The drive shafts, the part that drives the snowmachine track. were not holding up too well. On the Yukon, before Galena, the drive shafts on both machines were deteriorating real fast, forcing Morgan and Olds to slow down considerably. Pulling into Galena, they took a 10hour layover, seeing teams Minnick/Olstad and McKenna/VanMeter pull into Galena after them. After the layover, they were allowed to perform the repair, assisted by fellow racer Shane Barber and his team mate Ryan Sottosanti.

Morgan said the repair was quite involved and that he was pleased that it took only one hour to get the job on both machines done. After that, it was smooth sailing. The trail on the Yukon to Fairbanks was good, and Morgan/Olds posted the fastest time between Tanana and Fairbanks, which earned them another bonus check of $500 in addition to the third place prize money check of $18,000 and the $10,000 prize for the first team into Nome.

Other competitors that were hot on their heels didn't even make it to Fairbanks. Tyler Aklestad and Tyson Johnson had to scratch in Manley Hot Springs, due to loosing engine coolant fluids.

Aklestad had a scare coming out of Shaktoolik, Nome-bound, when his machine went through deep overflow. However, the team managed to fish out the snowmachine, get it started and continue on to Nome.

According to race marshal Chris Graeber, there was only one injury. Iron Dog rookie Chris Carroll, with team 5, broke his arm in a crash outside of Nome as they were coming into Nome.

Team 5 scratched in Nome.

Altogether, 24 teams finished the race, 14 scratched.

"Overall, it went real well," said Graeber. "It was close racing all the way around." Graber thanked volunteers who staff the checkpoints all along the trail and in Nome. "We couldn't have this race without volunteers," she said.

The Iron Dog had an overall prize purse of $248,350, including contingency prizes.

Winners Minnick/Olstad took home $50,000; runner-up McKenna/VanMeter received $35,000; third place finishers Morgan/Olds received $18,000; fourth place team George/George received $13,000 and fifth place Dick/Quam received $10,000.

DEFENDING CHAMPION - Eager to repeat his 2004 and 2013 feat of winning The Last Great Race, Mitch Seavey of Seward and his Iditarider John Radtke of Florida leave the ceremonial start line on Saturday, March 1, in Anchorage. As usual, Seavey has family on the trail as his son Dallas, the 2012 Iditarod champion, is competing and son Danny is driving a team of young dogs on the Iditarod  $\Delta$  trail. The 42nd running of the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race is taking the trail along the Northern route, crossing the Alaska Range, a vast stretch of the interior before heading onto the Yukon River. From there the trail leads from Kaltag to Unalakleet and up the Norton Sound coast to Nome. This year is billed to have one of the most challenging trail conditions due to an unusually warm and snowless winter in most parts of Alaska.

By Diana Haecker

The day before the ceremonial start of Iditarod 42 in Anchorage, melting ice and snow was dripping off rooftops, cars splashed through sizable puddles and mushers avoided talking about the weather.

Confident that a miracle would happen and that the 1,049-mile trail between Willow and Nome wouldn't be so bad and rough after all, the Iditarod mushers voiced optimism.

"They showed us pictures of the trail at the mushers meeting," said four-time champion Jeff King.

He said he has seen the trail like that before, and even in worse condition.

King acknowledged the work the Iditarod Trail Committee puts in to prepare the trail, although there is very little snow to work with this year. "I know they can't make snow out there, but they can get the obstacles out of the way and put up markers to tell us there is a dangerous spot coming up. So, I'm confident they've done the best they can. And I'm confident that a well-trained, experienced musher can navigate it," King said.

This stoic attitude was prevalent in most mushers, however, some adjusted their gear or number of dogs to the trail realities.

Cindy Abbott and Jim Lanier wore helmets even during the ceremonial start in Anchorage.

Written on Lanier's helmet were the words "For Brent," alluding to Yukon Quest musher Brent Sass, who fell off his sled during last month's Quest and suffered a concussion, which forced him to scratch from the race.

Jeff King said he would not hook up all 16 dogs to his sled until he reached Nikolai. King has a little sled trailer behind his sled, which comfortably carries two dogs.

Kotzebue rookie Katherine Keith left Willow with less than the maximum of 16 dogs allowed. "I'm leaving with 14 dogs. Given the trail conditions, I didn't want to have a team that was too powerful," Keith said.

Nome's Aaron Burmeister, embarking on his 15th Iditarod race, said he never worries about the trail too much.

'If I get too excited about the trail then I don't focus on the dogs," he said. "I take it one mile at a time, run my dogs according to my schedule and do what's best for them, and see where that puts us."

Unlike most mushers from around the state, Burmeister reports having had an excellent training season.

We had consistent conditions, decent snow and it's been a cold winter in Nenana," said Burmeis-He spends summers in Nome and moves his family to Nenana for winter training. He said since November, he had a great training season. "We were fortunate that we were one of the few mushers with decent trails and conditions. We hooked up and ran right out of the kennel," he said.

While mushers from the Bethel area, Kenai Peninsula and Mat-Su Valley had to contend with a warm winter, little snow and very icy trail conditions, Jeff King said he had a great training season, putting about 4,000 miles on the dogs in training since November. King purchased a Jeep mounted on tracks last fall, which he utilized for fall and winter training on the Denali Highway. The highway is now plowed in the winter, and the track Jeep allowed King to hook up a big string of dogs and train long miles on snow in near perfect conditions. "Kotzebue didn't have great training, the Peninsula didn't have great training and I never had better training," he said. "If training and conditioning counts, I

Dear Editor:

When being a follower of one political party or another, being connected to one element within society, or even being a member of the (socalled) monetary elite, means more to you than being a proud and productive citizen of this great nation of ours, then you may just as well throw in the towel, for you have become just another part of the overall problem!

Being an American after all, often entails making waves, bucking the tides, and even abandoning the corrosive mentality of being just another yes man! And if there is indeed power in numbers, you can also find destruction in being just another mindless and unquestioning follower of a corruptive status quo - just ask the Nazis, the Fascists, and even the Communist?

For that matter, you may also wish to consult with your own conscience about those times when you too have backed some political party line that you knew to be in error, and this over the dictates of your own common sense and power of reasoning?

Again, if there is indeed power in numbers, destruction too, has often rested silently beneath the very same soiled bed sheets that give comfort and solace to those who have lost the power, the desire, and even the ability to think for themselves! H. Rick Tavares Campo, California, 91906

In the past few years I have seen many of our own young people from our community graduate from high school and/or get their GED. Hats off to all of you— a huge accomplishment in life—proud of each and every one of you.

The reason I am voicing my concern is that many of the young people go off to college or technical school with whatever dream they have of accomplishing, their life dream of "what I want to be when I grow up." Some come back to the community and some move on.

Many have come back completing college, technical or trade school, hoping to fulfill their life-long dream. I feel overjoyed when I run across the young people, happy to be back with family and friends and most of all, job searching.

I run across them a few months or a year or so later, asking them "How's work, did you get a job?" Many and too many responses that really bother me are "No, I don't have enough experience." How is one to get experience if they are not given a chance? Responses of "I applied all over and I give up." "No one wants to hire me." What does that tell you? Dream down the drain. The only way for a person to get experience is to give them a chance. It's time for our community to give these young people a chance and hire our own people, to show them how proud we are of them furthering their education. Young people are our future voices and leaders. Our young families that have committed themselves and their families are here to stay. Their children are our future leaders. The ones who have graduated are freshly qualified and must be given the opportunity to fill positions that the jobs require, instead of filling them with unqualified individu-

Overreach— What a Stretch!

We'd cut off our nose to spite our face. Whenever the federal government tries to do something to help us, our politicians start screaming, "Federal overreach!" This is partisan politics at its worst.

Our governor won't cooperate with affordable health care and we don't get benefits. The Environmental Protection Agency puts the brakes on Pebble Mine in support of clean water and fisheries and the politicians start their mantra of federal overreach. Do none of our politicians on the state and federal level have a spine? They bend over backward to support the big oil, gas and foreign mining boys. Most Alaskans know that bending over too far backward tends to make one fall on their arse.

It is time to recognize that our federal agencies are not evil death rays. They are our government and it is their duty to look out for our better interests, especially when our state does not embrace its role as protector of her citizens. - N.L.M.-

Governor comments on federal EPA control and permitting case

Governor Sean Parnell issued the following statement Feb.24 as arguments were heard before the U.S. Supreme Court in Chamber of Commerce, State of Alaska, et.al.. v. EPA. Specifically, the chamber, Alaska, and others are challenging whether the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) can use its regulation of greenhouse gas from new motor vehicles to impose costly new air permitting requirements.

"The EPA is adding yet another layer of federal cost, control, and delay at the expense of Alaskans, small businesses, and our nation," Governor Parnell said. "When federal agencies abuse their authority and Congress fails to do anything about it, states, like Alaska, must stand up and exhaust all available options, including the courts. I remain hopeful that the court will grant relief."

Gail Schubert, chair of the Alaska Retirement Management Board announced the investment returns of the Public Employee's Retirement System (PERS) and the Alaska Teachers' Retirement System (TRS). For the quarter ending December 31, 2013, the PERS and TRS funds earned 5.7 percent. The one-year return is 18.71 percent for PERS and 18.76 percent for TRS.

Chair Schubert congratulated the staff of the Department of Revenue and her fellow trustees saying: "These returns place the retirement systems in the top quartile of public pension funds nationally and are a reflection of the commitment of the trustees and staff to continually seek the best investment options available in a reason-

EPA invokes Clean Water Act to protect Bristol Bay

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency is initiating a process under the Clean Water Act to protect the world's largest sockeye salmon fishery in Bristol Bay from the potentially destructive impacts of the proposed Pebble Mine.

An EPA press release said the Pebble Mine has the potential to be one of the largest open pit copper mines ever developed and could threaten a salmon resource rare in its quality and productivity.

While the EPA implementing the CWA process, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers cannot approve a permit for the mine.

This action, requested by EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy, reflects the unique nature of the Bristol Bay watershed as one of the world's last prolific wild salmon resources and the threat posed by the Pebble deposit, a mine unprecedented in scope and scale. It does not reflect an EPA policy change in mine permitting.

"Extensive scientific study has given us ample reason to believe that the Pebble Mine would likely have significant and irreversible negative impacts on the Bristol Bay watershed and its abundant salmon fisheries,' said EPA Administrator Gina Mc-Carthy. "It's why EPA is taking this step forward in our effort to ensure protection for the world's most productive salmon fishery from the risks it faces from what could be one of the largest open pit mines on earth. This process is not something the Agency does very often, but Bristol Bay is an extraordinary and unique resource.

The EPA is basing its action on available information, including data collected as a part of the agency's Bristol Bay ecological risk assessment and mine plans submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commis-

Dennis McLerran, EPA Regional Administrator for EPA Region 10, sent letters to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the State of Alaska and the Pebble Partnership initiating action under EPA's Clean Water Act Section 404(c) authorities.

"Bristol Bay is an extraordinary natural resource, home to some of the most abundant salmon producing rivers in the world. The area provides millions of dollars in jobs and food resources for Alaska Native Villages and commercial fishermen," McLerran said. "The science EPA reviewed paints a clear picture: Large-scale copper mining of the Pebble deposit would likely result in significant and irreversible harm to the salmon and the people and industries that rely on

In January 2014 the EPA released a study called "Assessment of Potential Mining Impacts on Salmon Ecosystems of Bristol Bay, Alaska.' The study documents the significant ecological resources of the region and the potentially destructive impacts to salmon and other fish from potential large-scale copper mining of the Pebble Deposit. The assessment indicates that the proposed Pebble Mine would likely cause irreversible destruction of streams that support salmon and other important fish species, as well as extensive areas of wetlands, ponds and lakes.

In 2010, several Bristol Bay Alaska Native tribes requested that EPA take action under Clean Water Act Section 404(c) to protect the Bristol Bay watershed and salmon resources from development of the proposed Pebble Mine, a venture backed by Northern Dynasty Minerals. The Bristol Bay ecosystem generates hundreds of millions of dollars in economic activity and provides employment for over 14,000 full and part-time workers.

Based on information provided by The Pebble Partnership and Northern Dynasty Minerals, mining the Pebble deposit may involve excavation of a pit up to one mile deep and over 2.5 miles wide — the largest open pit ever constructed in North America. Disposal of mining waste may require construction of three or more massive earthen tailings dams as high as 650 feet. The Pebble deposit is located at the headwaters of Nushagak and Kvichak rivers, which produce about half of the sockeye salmon in Bristol Bay.

The objective of the Clean Water Act is to restore and maintain the chemical, physical, and biological integrity of the nation's waters. The Act emphasizes protecting uses of the nation's waterways, including

The Clean Water Act generally requires a permit under Section 404 from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers before any person places dredge or fill material into wetlands, lakes and streams. Section 404 directs EPA to develop the environmental criteria the Army Corps uses to make permit decisions. It also authorizes EPA to prohibit or restrict fill activities if EPA determines such actions would have unacceptable adverse effects on fishery areas.

This is not a common process and has only been used 13 times since 1972 even though some 80,000 wetlands fill permits are issued each

The EPA has received over 850,000 requests from citizens, tribes, Alaska Native corporations, commercial and sport fisherman, jewelry companies, seafood processors, restaurant owners, chefs, conservation organizations, members of the faith community, sport recreation business owners, elected officials and others asking EPA to take action to protect Bristol Bay.

U.S. Sen. Mark Begich said in response to the EPA announcement that he agrees.

"While I am a strong supporter of responsible resource development including mining — I have said the Pebble Mine is the wrong mine in the wrong place. However, I am skeptical of federal overreach from an administration that has already demonstrated it does not understand Alaska's unique needs. The residents of Bristol Bay and Alaska Peninsula need certainty to plan their future and I will be making sure the administration does not take any actions that could have unintended consequences down the road for this region or other development projects in Alaska.'

Representative Don Young did not agree with the EPA decision. He said that he has always been clear about the severity of the EPA's unwarranted involvement in the pro-Pebble Mine project, posed especially this early in the process. "This expansive, jurisdictional power grab proposed by the EPA severely jeopardizes not only Alaska's sovereignty, but the rights of states and all private property owners nationwide," said Young.

The United Tribes of Bristol Bay welcomed the announcement. Robert Heyano, Chairman of UTBB said the EPA's decision to protect Bristol Bay through the Clean Water Act is one of historical importance. "There is no other place in the entire world like Bristol Bay. The salmon that return to our watershed every year have sustained our tribes since time immemorial, while also providing our friends and neighbors with the commercial and sport harvesting opportunities that guarantee our region's economy remains strong," he said. "The Bristol Bay salmon fishery is a national treasure. UTBB looks forward to working directly with EPA to ensure that this treasure is protected forever."

Port proposes modest rate increase

By Sandra Medearis

The Nome Port Commission will be handing up a revised package of port tariff rules and regulations for Nome Common Council approval.

The commission considered the rules, including a raise in land storage rates, at a commission meeting late last month.

Faced with the need to have the port operation pay for itself as an enterprise activity of the City of Nome, and at the same time attract business and avoid getting too big a scoop into the pockets of local fishermen and miners, the panel voted 4-2 on a modest increase for port facility use.

To avoid a revenue shortfall, the panel put in a general revenue increases of 3 percent, excluding fuel and cargo and a rise in port storage rates, taking rates on upland storage to 7 cents per sq. ft. and causeway storage to 10 cents.

Commissioners also declared intent to charge large vessels for the square footage of their footprint for storage rather than by just linear feet of length. Port staff reported contacts with several potential port users intending to bring vessels around 90 feet long for summer season activi-

The commission decided that a raise in storage rates and 3 percent was a fairer way to assure revenue, as it would apply to all users rather than cherry pick higher revenue rates from certain classes of port users, and avoid hitting small-scale users in the fuel tanks.

The Nome Port Commission, with Council approval, raised rates by 10 percent across the board last

A port rate study contracted by the port last year suggested a 25-percent increase, a figure rejected as too high, to pass on to consumers of goods and fuel.

Another increase was necessary this season, according to Joy Baker, port project manager, due to the rise of fuel and labor costs.

Additionally, the port needed more revenue to keep ahead of the demand for expansion from increased traffic stemming from mineral exploration, resource recovery and mining activities.

The port will soon have work underway to set the scene for adding a dock between the two existing docks-WestGold and City dockson the causeway.

This middle dock would increase causeway capacity by 50 percent, according to Baker.

The port additionally needs revenue for repairs and modifications to the Fish Docks.

The commission is standing pat on the decision to prohibit any vessels—anything designed to float from dry dock or storage on causeway docks or the causeway road at any time of year. Commissioners considered raising the rate to discourage such use, but decided there was too much risk of vessels overstaying the slack season and as a result, interfering with high-dollar cargo operations in an already congested area.

The Council must review and approve the final draft in two stages with an opportunity for public comment before final adoption.

Anchorage) released the following statement on the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's decision to initiate the process outlined in section 404 (c) of the Clean Water Act in regards to protecting the Bristol Bay area and its fisheries from potential damage caused by development of the Pebble Mine.

'Having the EPA come in to do the state's work to protect our fishing streams was not my first choice. But the governor refused to take the action to stand up for Alaskans in Bristol Bay, and the majority of Alaskans who value our fishing waters. Were I in his place, I would not have sided with foreign mine owners who seek to jeopardize the world's greatest wild salmon and trout waters," said Gara. "The mines Alaska has in place now are responsible. This one poses too great a risk to our fishing heritage and fishing economy, and the governor should have acted."

New Coast Guard leadership nominated

Last week, the White House nominated Vice Admiral Paul F. Zukunft to be the 25th Commandant of the United States Coast Guard after Admiral Robert Papp will retire.

Senator Lisa Murkowski called it good news for the nation, great news for Alaska and a positive step forward for America's Arctic future. "I had the chance to meet Vice Admiral Zukunft last month and get to know him when he guided me around the new Coast Guard Sector Anchorage building. I was impressed immediately with his leadership and intelligence – but also with his background and knowledge base in the Pacific and the Arctic. Alaska's hundreds of thousands of nautical square miles is daunting to those familiar with them, but to Vice Admiral Zukunft, they are his home at sea," Murkowski said.

EPA sets cleaner fuel and car standards

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency last week finalized emission standards for cars and gasoline that will significantly reduce harmful pollution and prevent thousands of premature deaths and illnesses, while also enabling efficiency improvements in the cars and trucks we drive

A press release said the standards are based on extensive input from the public and a broad range of stakeholders, including public health groups, auto manufacturers, refiners, and states.

Once fully in place, the standards will help avoid up to 2,000 premature deaths per year and 50,000 cases of respiratory ailments in children.

These standards are a win for public health, a win for our environment, and a win for our pocketbooks," said EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy. "By working with the auto industry, health groups, and other stakeholders, we're continuing to build on the Obama Administration's broader clean fuels and vehicles efforts that cut carbon pollution, clean the air we breathe, and save families money at the pump.'

The final standards will quickly and effectively cut harmful soot, smog and toxic emissions from cars and trucks. They aim to improve fuel economy and reduce greenhouse gases and result in average fuel savings of more than $8,000 by 2025 over a vehicle's lifetime.

NOAA Fisheries to pay $75 million to areas of fishery

Congress last week approved an allocation of $75 million to NOAA Fisheries from the disaster relief fund to be paid to several areas with fishery disasters, including the Alaska Chinook salmon fishery for 2011 and

NOAA Fisheries announced that Alaska salmon fisheries will receive

The allocation comes after the Department of Commerce declared six fishery disasters in 2012 and 2013.

Other fisheries receiving funds are the commercial fisheries in American Samoa following the tsunami of 2009; commercial fisheries in Mississippi following the Mississippi River flood of 2011; the New England multispecies groundfish fishery for the 2013 season; the Florida oyster fishery in the Gulf of Mexico due to a drought in 2012; and fisheries in New York and New Jersey following Hurricane Sandy in 2012.

"Our nation's fisheries are critically important to the lives and livelihoods of many communities," said Eileen Sobeck, NOAA Fisheries assistant administrator. "NOAA Fisheries will work with affected communities, states and tribes as quickly as possible to ensure that the disaster relief funding gets allocated as quickly as possible.'

Funding recipients will have broad latitude to determine the best use of the funds to meet the unique needs of their local businesses and communities. Funds can be used for activities that, "restore the fishery or prevent a similar failure in the future, and to assist a fishing community affected by such failure."

Under the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act, the Commerce Secretary can declare a fishery disaster, which makes it possible for Congress to appropriate funds to provide economic assistance to fishing businesses and communities, including fishermen, affected by a disaster and to support other activities addressing the disasnever had a better conditioned team than I have this year. I have more miles of quality training than I ever

He said that in November his team clocked 1,000 miles and in the last week of January and first week of February, he put another 1,200 miles on the dogs, for a grand total of nearly 4,000 miles so far. "My goal in January and February was to mimic a 1,000 mile race," he said. King won the Kobuk 440 in Kotzebue last year, undoubtedly one of the fastest and toughest mid-distance races in the state. "My team in the Kobuk last year was probably the finest conditioned team I ever had," said King. "Coming off the Iditarod last year I realized they were better as a result of being in the Iditarod than ever before. I'm hoping I got this team in the condition it was when we went to Kotzebue for the Kobuk 440 last year.'

To that end, he said the Jeep setup allowed him to train comfortably, hauling food for the dogs and himself, and making it easy to take care of tired dogs by hauling them in the Jeep. "We did things that we couldn't and wouldn't have done before and it resulted in tremendous miles and quality, low speed training," he said. King, who finished a very close second behind Rohn Buser in the Kuskokwim 300, said he knows that Buser has a well-trained team, but he wondered aloud what conditions were like in Norway. There are four Norwegians in the race, one of them 2003 and 2005 champion Robert Sorlie.

Home team

Aaron Burmeister said his team consists of 13 returning veteran sled dogs that finished last year's race. "They're right in their prime," Burmeister said. He also has a twoyear-old and two three-year-old young dogs to round out his 16-dog team. Burmeister said he would follow the same schedule as in years past, easing the dogs into the race. "I typically like to run through the heat of the day between Finger Lake and Rohn, because it keeps the team walking through the technically difficult parts.'

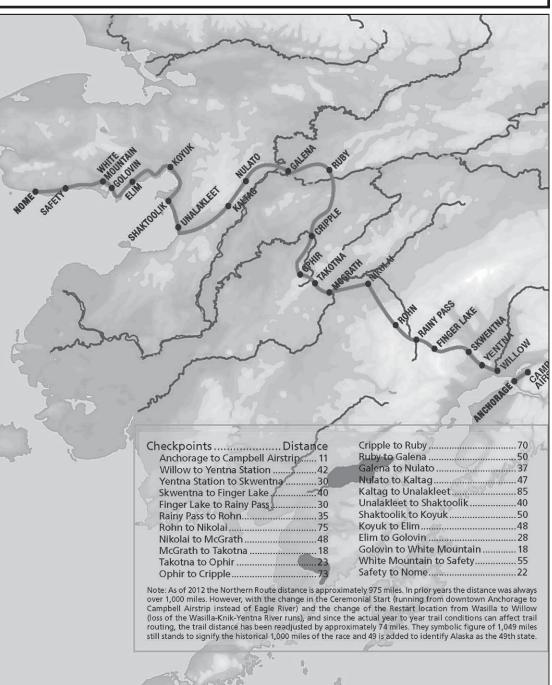

He said he didn't make any changes to the schedule he ran in the past few years. "In the past, that schedule got me to the middle of the race with a real strong 15- or 16strong dog team," Burmeister said.

into the rhythm of the race, they do get stronger at certain times in the race and then they are charging, he

"Last year, I stood on the drag all the way to Unalakleet, but then they got sick."

With a strong field of many champions and young chargers nipping at their heels, Burmeister said it's anyone's guess who he'll be watching out for. "I hope to bring victory home to Nome but there is a lot of competition out there," he said. He listed Buser, the Norwegians, Jeff King, the Seaveys - both 2004 and 2013 champion Mitch and 2012 champion Dallas Seavey – are out there, as is Aliy Zirkle, driving the 2013 and 2014 Yukon Quest champion team. "And there is the younger crop of Jake [Berkowitz] Pete Kaiser and Mike [Williams] Jr. - I couldn't even take a guess. My biggest competitor is myself," said Burmeister. "I need to keep my team together and focus on them. If they can bring me to the race in Kaltag, we'll be ready to go."

We start evaluating things on the Yukon River and make a strong push on the coast," he said. Last year, he said, his team fell sick at the coast, which slowed him down. "I hope we can keep them healthy so we can race," Burmeister said.

He is using the same sled as in years past. "I just changed some nuts and bolts on it and made sure everything is ready to go." However, he packed tools, parts and spare runners to be prepared. And what else is in the drop bags at checkpoints?

Wife Mandy's cooking for the musher, consisting of moose chili and moose stew, salmon strips and moose jerky. "The dogs eat a lot better than I do," laughed Burmeister. Depending on the weather, temperatures and calories they need, Burmeister will serve either beef, tripe, beef fat, fish or kibble. While the 1,000-mile Iditarod sled dog race is an annual routine for veterans like Buser, Burmeister or Jeff King, there are 15 rookies in the field of 69 mushers. One of them is Kotzebue's Katherine Keith, 35. who runs dogs out of her partner John Baker's kennel. At the ceremonial start in Anchorage, her dog truck was parked in one of the less busy side streets, where she had time to take a moment and let the reality sink in. "It's overwhelming, finally being here on race day," she said. "It takes so much effort to even get here."

Not only counting the hours and days and weeks of training, feeding, caring for the dogs - a 24/7 yearround commitment - but also to train and travel to qualifying races, organizing the travel by plane to Anchorage and dealing with the logistics of moving more than a dozen race dogs, the gear, food and sleds to the start line. "There are so many things that can go wrong just to get here. I still don't believe we're here," she said. She has qualified by running the Kobuk 440 and the 2014 Kuskokwim race. "I'm excited to get out there and seeing a lot of Alaska that I haven't seen before.' She runs four dogs that have been in John Baker's 2011 champion team, and a mix of ten younger dogs ages three to four years old. Like her, that's their first Iditarod, and she plans to give them a good experi-

"I'm looking forward to see what they're gonna do in a long race like this. If I'm conservative enough, they should be able to do well. I want to build them up and get them better and better. I have a time goal and how I'd like to race, but my ultimate goal is to have a positive enjoyable race and make sure that all the dogs get there with lots of confidence," said Keith.

Dear Editor:

The Education Session, the Gasline Project, the Fiscal Cliff, which is it? Can legislators pick one and get something done during this legislative session? Alaska's future depends on it.

One need watch only a little of Gavel Alaska to see that partisan politics is in the driver's seat right now. Not surprising, it is an election year. Good leadership is so badly needed.

Governor Parnell, in his State of the State speech, asked sides to come out of their trenches and work together. I had a moment of relief then he threw his grenades and declared this the Education Session. He submitted SJR9. This amends our state constitution; grenade one. Then he threw his support to share public school funds with private school choice; grenade two. Supporters of SJR9 say it isn't about money. It is clearly about money. And, it's about amending the constitution. What a distraction from the Gasline Project. Alaskans are now pitted against each other over Education funding. Education is near and dear to the hearts of most Alaskans. The war is on. Good job Governor. I'd say "Bad timing."

Add to the Education war raging, the Gasline Project and oil tax legislation - both critical to our economic future. To date, no apparent consensus is emerging via legislative hearings. In fact, there is deep division. Why the Governor couldn't have declared this the "Economic Session" I ask myself? The younger generation must have a job, or better yet a career. Nothing is more important than a robust economy. Perhaps the Education/Constitution grenades were deliberate distractions, a political strategy, I have to wonder. I'd say "Focus Legislators, focus!"

It is very difficult to listen to the Gasline Project (SB138) hearings. It is incredibly boring but one message about the complexity of this strange partnership with giant oil producers is getting through loud and clear. Perhaps we, the state, are in over our heads. I don't know how it's going to work with so many moving parts. Intelligent arguments are being pitted against the deal struck by Governor Parnell. On top of that, there is no trust on either side, let alone with the general public. I do know we don't have a lot of time to figure it out. I'd say, "Focus people,

Then there is the dark and looming Fiscal Cliff. We cannot have a good education system or a healthy economy without money to invest in both. I don't agree with the popular opinion to cut program spending. I do support cutting government size and spending. State operations and the capital budget could be the first step in reduced spending if we had courageous leadership. Smart budgeting and internal audits would produce millions in savings; however, I don't see any political will to go this direction. One can only hope. I don't believe the sky is falling or any other doomsday predictions. I'd say "Start at the top Administration."

In summary, I'm confused. I doubt I'm the only one. Courageous leadership can take us out of the confusion and lead us to prosperity. Fortunately, it is an election year. get to choose Every election November. counts. Vote, vote, vote.

Saying something over and over again doesn't make it true.

The supporters of Ballot Measure 1 have one tired line. But the facts tell a different story.

FACT: There is no oil wealth giveaway. Oil tax reform just went into effect January 1. Falling global oil prices and declining oil production under the old system (ACES) primarily contributed to the dip in state revenues. Oil tax reform is not to blame. FACT: Beginning in July, Alaska will take in more oil tax revenue under the new tax system than the old, failed tax system (ACES), according to Official forecasts. (Source: Alaska Dept. of Revenue, February 2014)

Zirkle was the first woman

ALASKA GIRLS—Two-time runner-up Aliy Zirkle of Two Rivers is all smiles at the ceremonial start of Iditarod 42 in downtown Anchorage on March 1, 2014. Zirkle was the first woman to win the Yukon Quest in 2000. Zirkle's husband Allen Moore, also running this year's Iditarod is a two-time champion of the Yukon Quest, having won the race in 2013 and 2014.

ANIAK MUSHER— Richie Diehl of Aniak on the Kuskokwim River leaves Fourth Avenue at the start of his second Iditarod, having finished Iditarod 2013 in 36th place.

DARK HORSE— Nicolas Petit of Girdwood finished in a career high sixth place in Iditarod 2013 and is considered by many pundits to be one of the dark horses of Iditarod 42. Petit was born in France, making the Iditarod a truly international event with teams from around the globe.

CANADIAN MUSHER— Un-retired four-time Yukon Quest champion and Iditarod runner-up 2010 Hans Gatt mushes down the Avenue.

IN MEMORY — Charlie Simpson of University Place, Washington caught a ride with Conway Seavey, wearing bib 1 for her grandma, the late Debbie Trosper, longtime Iditarod volunteer who died last August.

Iditarod promotes vaccine awareness

Mushers carry diphtheria vaccine to Nome

In an effort to promote vaccine awareness Lisa Schobert, Vaccine Coordinator and Dawyn Sawyer, PA along with their team sent the diphtheria vaccine on the Iditarod dog sled race that started March 1.

During this Iditarod athletic event, musher Martin Buser will carry the DTaP vaccine and musher Aliy Zirkle will carry the Tdap vaccine over 1049 miles of the Iditarod dog sled race from Anchorage to Nome. Buser is known for his playful spirit and is expected to hand off the vaccine to other mushers yet recapture it towards the finish line in Nome. Aliy is known for her competitive heart and is expected to carry the vaccine all the way to Nome. It's anyone's race and you never know what will happen. Alaska weather plays an enormous factor in the race along with the stamina of the ath-

In 1925 a diphtheria outbreak occurred in Nome, Alaska. Dr. Curtis Welch recognized the outbreak and requested assistance from around the country. Nome had enough diphtheria antitoxin for only a few patients and a significant amount more was needed to treat all infected with the deadly diphtheria bacteria. An Anchorage doctor located part of the needed antitoxin and the serum was placed on a train from Anchorage to Nenana.

The only way to continue the transport of the antitoxin was via dog sled. In a relay team style, the serum was taken from Nenana to Nome, via many dog teams. Blizzard weather and negative temperatures caused the dog teams to travel through severe conditions and eventually the antitoxin reached Nome.

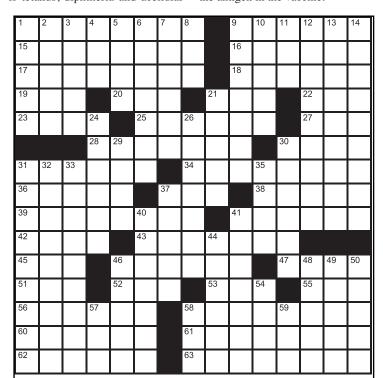

In 1973 The Last Great Race ® sled dog race began. It's simply called the Iditarod (www.iditarod.com). Historians quote several reasons as to why the race began. Joe Reddington desired to revitalize dog mushing. Reddington had one thought; Dorothy Page had another and The State of Alaska vet another.

Ten vaccine vials were placed in one box and sent with Buser and Zirkle. Each box weighs 2.3 ounces. Aliy Zirkle will carry 10 vials of Tdap, Martin Buser will carry 10 vials of DTaP and Robert Sorlie will carry Td. All vaccines contain the diphtheria antigen. Dr. Karen O'Neill is the physician at Norton Sound Health Corporation (NSHC) who will receive the vaccine when it arrives. School children from all over the country will follow the lessons provided from Jen Reiter, Teacher on the Trail.

Dawyn Sawyer, PA will host several presentations in March, around the history of the 1925 diphtheria run. Her goal is to educate people about the continued need for vaccines. History is something that can be easily forgotten. Sawyer has a great interest in the history of medicine as it impacts our medical care today. Nome will also host several immunization events where community people can come and receive vaccinations.

DTaP stands for diphtheria, tetanus and acellular pertussis. Tdap is tetanus, diphtheria and acellular pertussis. The nomenclature of the capitalization indicates the amount of the antigen in the vaccine.

Vaccines save lives!

By Dawn Sawyer, PA-C Norton Sound Health Corp.

Alaska Iditarod mushers, Martin Buser and Aliy Zirkle are helping to raise awareness this year along the Iditarod trail for the continued need to protect our population by vaccinating people for diseases at the proper times. Each will carry the modern diphtheria vaccine, a child and adult version, DTap or TDaP, (which also contain Tetanus toxoid and the whooping cough vaccine, Pertussis), in memory of the first serum run when 20 dog mushers raced against time to bring diphtheria antitoxin (this was before vaccines were widely available) to Nome to help stop the spread of this deadly disease. Martin and Aliy have been promoting vaccines along the trail for several years, and we applaud their efforts. Other Iditarod mushers, such as Paul Gebhardt and his wife, have also traveled around the state speaking at schools to promote childhood immunizations. The mushers are carrying box of diphtheria vaccines (10 vials) from Norton Sound Health Corporation (NSHC) in their dog sled and will hand it off to a NSHC medical provider at the finish gate in Nome, who will take it to the new NSHC hospital, and deliver the commemorative vial to the physician on call.

Vaccine clinics, sponsored by NSHC will be held in Nome during Iditarod week to raise awareness for the continued need to vaccinate. A table will be at the Nome Recreation Center during the Lonnie O Conner Basketball Tournament all week to vaccinate and promote healthy living. A vaccine clinic will be held at XYZ Senior Center on Wednesday, March 12 at XYZ from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. (during the noon meal). Please stop by and check your immunization status and let us keep you healthy.

Dawyn Sawyer, a Physician Assistant working at NSHC, will be giving an oral presentation, Diphtheria and the Serum Run, the medical side of the story, on Wednesday, March 13 at 4 p.m. She was able to look at medical records from the Carrie M McLain Memorial museum to assist with information on her topic. She will also be giving another presentation on the Community Health Aide program: A Unique Response to a Need, on Thursday, March 14, at 4 p.m. Both programs will be held at UAF Northwest Campus Conference room. Snacks will be provided with discussion after the presentations. Dawyn has been a PA for more than 20 years. She has lived in Nome for the past seven years, teaching at the Nome Ilisagvik (a place to learn) Training Center affiliated with Norton Sound Health Corporation. # Nome Board of Education crunches budget numbers

By Sarah Miller

The Nome Board of Education met February 25 in a regular work session to discuss the Superintendent's proposed budget for the 2014-2015 school year. Needing to make up a $274,000 deficit and faced with the challenge of working with some as-yet unknown figures, the board looked at possible options for balancing the budget including withdrawing from the district's fund balance, cutting expenditures, and requesting more funds from the city council. Board President Betsy Brennan stated, "We're looking at options that will have the least impact on classrooms."

Paula Coffman, district business manager, explained the City's minimum funding requirement for the schools based on assessed property tax values. For FY 2015, the city is looking at increased tax revenue due to an increase in assessed values, "therefore, they're required to pass more funding to us," stated Coffman. For the current fiscal year, the City funded Nome Public Schools at approximately 62 percent of the maximum contribution allowed by the state. The City has also historically provided additional funding at its discretion to the school district, and Coffman told the board that City Manager Josie Bahnke expressed to her that the City was intending to provide this additional funding at the same level as the current year.

Board member Barb Nickels pointed out that the City has traditionally been "happy to give us additional funding, as well as extra for wish list items." Brennan explained that when the City drafts its budget proposals, they present several versions of the budget with different millage rates so they can project taxpayer costs alongside City revenues and expenses. The decision to fund the school district depends year-toyear on what is happening with the City's budget, stated Brennan.

Nickels commented, "It's going to be a tight year with the new city council. They're facing just as many deficits, if not more, as we are." The board drafted its budget to request approximately $1.2 million in funding from the city council.

Nickels proposed that the board revise the superintendent's proposed budget to include all items as necessary items, rather than include a separate line item for additional, or "wish list" items that the district could do without. The City has invited the school board to present wish list items in prior years, but Nickels stated, "If we already have deficits to the hundreds of thousands like we have now, none of this is additional. That's money we need. If we need it, it should be in the budget." Coffman told the board that the City requires the district to earmark all funds for specific purposes. Superintendent Gast noted that the budget needed to be drafted around maintaining current basic costs of operation and programming, not worrying about "extras."

Coffman next reviewed the foundation formula portion of the budget draft. The foundation formula is the state's method of determining how to equitably distribute state funds to schools. It covers basic costs of operation at per-student levels that are set by the state, factoring in variables that differ for each school or district around the state such as enrollment, a school or district's size, costs unique to individual school districts in Álaska, and dollars for special needs of students (special education, intensive services, vocational education, gifted, bilingual, and home school students). Applying these numbers to the foundation formula gives an Average Daily Membership (ADM) figure, which is multiplied by the Base Student Allocation (BSA) to determine a school's Basic Need, the amount required to provide a basic education for students. Subtracting from this figure the required local contribution and impact aid (federal funds) leaves a remainder that is funded by the state.

The current BSA of $5,680 was set in 2011, but the amount for the upcoming school year has not yet been determined as legislators in Juneau wrangle over whether to increase it and by what amount. A decision on the BSA is expected near the end of April. The board is taking a conservative approach, calculating its budget on the existing BSA and a projected enrollment of 695 students, K-12. Coffman told the board that in prior years there have been onetime grants provided to school districts by the state, and there may be funds set aside for grants such as these in the governor's budget for the upcoming year, but that is not guaranteed at this point. With this many unknown variables, and with such a large funding gap in the proposed budget, the board emphasized that this budget is still very much in draft

The most significant expenses factoring into the proposed budget were personnel costs such as teacher salaries and health insurance costs. In the draft, Gast had already cut a full-time certified position at Human Resources, reduced a special education secretary position and full-time senior high teacher's position to part time (at the employees' requests), and eliminated two aide positions at the elementary school. Even with these cuts, personnel expenditures are projected to be at least $1 million higher than the current year. Some of the increase is due to a 10 percent increase in health care costs, an estimated amount because the health insurance company was unable to provide the district with a definite number at the time of the meeting. Last year, health insurance costs increased 12 percent.

Board member Jennifer Reader asked if currently employed aides were informed that they might not have a position next year based on this current budget. Gast and Nickels stated that it was premature to inform employees of potential cuts at this point as the budget process was still in its early stages, with no final decisions made. Nickels stated, "Last week we were talking about cutting different positions. This week we're looking at a different scenario, and next week will be even more different. We might decide not to cut any positions if other parts of the budget change. It's a moving target." Reader agreed, pointing out that the board work session meetings are public and all members of the community can be kept informed of developments by attending the meetings, but said that she felt it was important to consider the "employee perspective."

Non-personnel expenditures were cut by $170,000 over the prior year in the proposed budget. Staff and board travel was cut by one-third. Nickels emphasized the importance of providing staff development for new state mandated initiatives of curriculum alignment and new teacher evaluation, as well as training on new curriculum that the districts may adopt, expressing concern that funding for those items were not reflected in the proposed budget. Gast pointed out that districts similar to Nome Public Schools around the state were having similar difficulties arriving at a concrete amount to fund for items such as these that can be impacted by many fluctuating variables such as substitute teachers, teacher stipends, materials, time requirements, and travel costs. The board agreed that Gast would work on providing an estimate for items to include in a revised budget for the next meeting.

Other non-personnel expenditures discussed included maintenance, student travel, utilities, fuel, electricity. communications, services such as snow removal and maintenance, JROTC, supplies, curriculum, dues and fees, and property and liability insurance which has been on a gradual increase.

Coffman closed the meeting by sharing that close to $200,000 in surplus funds may be available left over from a transportation grant that the district received. However, once money for the new state initiatives is added into the expenditures side of the budget, a funding gap will still remain and the board will need to pursue all possible sources to make up the deficit. The board outlined possible options for additional funds, including requesting the city council to increase its contribution. Brennan asked about the status of applying for a pre-K grant that will be ending this year, and Gast stated that if the grant was extended and reopened for application, the district would submit its application immediately. Nickels asked for the superintendent to present some different scenarios for cuts at the board's next meeting on March 18.

In other business, the school board heard a proposal from Kelsey Beecher, who is coordinating a grant funded by the state to prevent youth obesity. Beecher proposed implementing Body Mass Index screenings in the schools to track the effectiveness of wellness initiatives. With parent permission, height and weight measurements would be collected on students and then be plugged into a database that calculates the BMI results. Results would be sent home to parents with health improvement tips and referrals to health care providers if the BMI falls into a health risk category. Beecher stated that she was seeking the school board's support of this program in case parents had concerns about privacy or invasiveness. The program would begin in the fall of 2014. The board is considering the proposal.

Legislators welcome potential for F-35s to come to Alaska

Representative David Guttenberg (D-Fairbanks), Representative Scott Kawasaki (D-Fairbanks) and Representative Geran Tarr (D-Anchorage), and Senator Bill Wielechowski (D-Anchorage) welcomed the Pentagon's announcement that Eielson Air Force Base outside Fairbanks and Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson (JBER) in Anchorage are two of the five Pacific military bases the Air Force is considering to station the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter.

"Alaska's north Pacific location makes it an excellent strategic choice for stationing the F-35s," said Guttenberg. "Whether they land in Anchorage or Fairbanks, the Air Force and our nation will be well-served by stationing these cutting-edge aircraft in Alaska.'

'Alaska is finally being recognized for its strategic importance and location," Kawasaki said. "With the opening of the Arctic and ongoing conflicts Asia and the Pacific arena, it makes sense that our military continues to grow here."

'Working together with our Congressional delegation, we have advanced our position as a leading location for the F-35s. This supports our strong position as a superpower for the Asia-Pacific Theater and the Obama administration's pivot to Asia. Moving F-35s to Alaska will increase our military preparedness for defending our state and nation," said Tarr, a member of the Joint Armed Services Committee. "Fairbanks, Anchorage, and all of Alaska have worked together to support our military bases, and we look forward to hosting the F35s wherever they may land in Alaska."

"Alaska would be an ideal home for the F35s," said Wielechowski, also a member of the Joint Armed Services Committee. "Our training ranges are the best in the world and provide a superior training experience."

Emotional public testimony supports bills for LGBT equality

On the same day that Senator French introduced a resolution to repeal Alaska's ban on same-sex marriage, Alaskans lined up to testify in support of Senator Berta Gardner's bill (SB 131) to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation. Representative Andy Josephson is carrying an analogous House bill (HB 139) to prohibit discrimination.

"What we heard today is that Alaskans from all walks of life support equality and oppose discrimination," said Mike Wenstrup, chair of the Alaska Democratic Party. "I hope our Republican colleagues were listening.'

Public testimony in support of Senator Gardner's anti-discrimination bill was offered by military veterans, Alaskans who have gone to court in opposition to discrimination, and many others. Business groups also have advocated for equality on the premise that it will help Alaska recruit and retain highly skilled

Gara, Kawasaki introduce non-partisan redistricting proposal

Legislation offers a fair, non-partisan approach to developing future legislative districts

"The decennial redistricting process too often has made a mockery of our nation's ideal of truly representative democracy..

- League of Women Voters Education Fund, Shining a Light (Jan. 2012 p. 1)
- "....[V]oters don't choose lawmakers lawmakers routinely choose voters. Drawn by partisan legislatures, most districts now are truly one party fiefdoms.'
  - Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School

Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) and Representative Scott Kawasaki (D-Fairbanks) filed a constitutional amendment to end Alaska's process of partisan, one-party-controlled redistricting. If passed and ratified by Alaskan voters, the bi-partisan redistricting legislation would let Alaska join nine other states with either non-partisan or bi-partisan redistricting, according to a report by the legislature's Legislative Research Services.

'This legislation offers Alaskans a fair, non-partisan approach to developing future redistricting boards," said Kawasaki.

'Alaskans deserve real democracy, not election results that political parties pre-arrange," said Gara.

The legislation would create a bi-partisan redistricting process in Alaska. Each of the two largest parties picks an even number of members, and those members choose a tiebreaking member. If the four members cannot agree on the fifth member, then the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is charged with picking a person the Justice certifies as non-partisan.

Gordon S. Harrison, former executive director of the Alaska Redistricting Board, stated in a report called The Aftermath of In Re 2001 Redistricting Cases: The Need For a New Constitutional Scheme for Legislative Redistricting in Alaska: "Toleration of partisan gerrymandering is unfortunate because gerrymandering is election fraud, no less pernicious than stuffing the ballot box or intimidating or bribing voters."

'Intentionally tilting election lines in favor of one party puts party politics ahead of the public's right to free elections, and nationally, both parties have done it since Governor Elbridge Gerry, the Father of Gerrymandering, cheated the first time in 1812," said Gara.

Under current Alaska law, the governor appoints two members to the redistricting board, the Speaker of the Alaska House of Representatives appoints one, and the President of the Alaska Senate appoints one. The Alaska Supreme Court picks the fifth member. For the 2012 board, Governor Parnell picked two Republicans, and the House and Senate added another Republican each, creating the four to one Republican majority on the redistricting board.

'I've heard the argument that election lines should be party controlled because both parties have done it in the past. That's not a reason to perpetuate injustice," said Gara.

Lois Epstein, board member with Alaska Public Interest Research Group (AKPIRG) said, "It is never in the best interest of the public for a single political party to control the creation of legislative districts. This legislation provides an avenue for a non-partisan redistricting process.'

The joint resolution was to be assigned a bill number and referred to committees.

House Democratic Legislators welcome new representative Sam Kito III

House Democratic legislators gathered around Sam Kito III to announce his confirmation as the new representative for House District 32. The caucus met Monday night Feb. 24 along with Democratic members of the House Majority to unanimously confirm Kito.

"We are excited to announce Sam Kito III as the newest member of our caucus," said House Democratic Leader Chris Tuck (D-Anchorage). "Sam's integrity and strong character, extensive experience, and close connection to his constituents will help him make an immediate and positive impact for Alaska and the Southeast communities he represents."

Kito is a lifelong Alaskan with over 24 years of experience in engineering, economic development, and government relations. He has significant experience in the fishing and transportation sectors—two areas of great importance to Juneau and the other Southeast Alaska communities in House District 32.

"I am looking forward to joining the House Democratic Caucus and working on issues important to my constituents and the state," said Kito.

Governor Sean Parnell appointed Kito to the position on Friday, February 21, subject to confirmation by democratic lawmakers in the Alaska state House of Representatives. Kito was one of three names the local democratic party organization, the Tongass Democrats, forwarded to the governor to consider for the appointment. The seat became vacant when Representative Beth Kerttula resigned her seat earlier this year to take a position at Stanford University.

House District 32 includes downtown Juneau, Petersburg, Skagway, Gustavus, Tenakee Springs, Kupreanof, Excursion Inlet and Hobart Bay.

Kito was sworn in Wednesday, February 26 during the House Floor Session. He is expected to serve on the House Community and Regional Affairs Committee pending approval by the House Committee on Committees.

Legislature honors heroes of Good Friday Earthquake Declares March 27, 2014 Good Friday Earthquake Remembrance Day

The Alaska Legislature remembered the Alaskans who came together 50 years ago in the wake of the Good Friday Earthquake to find survivors, heal the injured and rebuild Southcentral Alaska.

The Alaska Senate unanimously passed House Joint Resolution 23 which proclaims March 27, 2014 as Good Friday Earthquake Remembrance Day in Alaska. Sponsored by Rep. Charisse Millett, R-Anchorage, the resolution honors the men and women that put the needs of others before their own needs after the massive quake and tsunami that leveled entire com-

"As soon as the ground stopped shaking everyone became a first responder," Millett said. "The stories I've heard about the determination and courage shown by Alaskans that day are remarkable and this is the least the legislature can do to honor everyone from the day that changed Alaska forever.'

The Good Friday Earthquake lasted for about three minutes. The quake and the tsunami claimed more than 100 lives and virtually every community in Southcentral Alaska was damaged. Thirty blocks of downtown Anchorage were destroyed and Valdez was leveled by a massive tsunami.

Rep. Kawasaki Introduces Legislation to Compensate Victims of Wrongful Imprisonment

Representative Scott Kawasaki (D-Fairbanks) introduced legislation to protect Alaskans who are wrongfully convicted and subsequently serve time in prison.

"Our judicial system is meant to incarcerate the guilty and protect the innocent," said Kawasaki. "If the system fails Alaskans, then the state is responsible to help the innocent get back on their feet."

The bill (HB352) would create an administrative process whereby victims of overturned criminal convictions can request compensation from the state for time served. They can be compensated up to $50,000 per year with a cap at two million dollars. In order to qualify for the compensation, the claimant must have served time in prison and then have been exonerated via retrial, dismissed charges, or executive pardon because of inno-

"While there is no price on the personal and emotional suffering of those wrongly imprisoned, this bill would bring Alaska up to the federal compensation standard to help right the state's wrong," said Kawasaki.

If passed, Alaska would be the thirtieth state, plus the District of Columbia, to have a compensation statute of some form.

The bill received a referral to the House State Affairs and House Judiciary committees.

Republicans' revised bill would increase unplanned pregnancies

$GOP\ removes\ family\ planning\ provisions\ that\ would\ have$ reduced number of unplanned pregnancies

Republicans eliminated a provision to encourage use of contraception, creating the risk that S.B. 49 will increase the number of abortions. The House Finance Committee stripped family planning language that had support from Senate Democrats and Republicans.

"If Republicans really wanted to reduce the number of abortions, then they would support contraception. Instead, this bill would simply invade women's privacy while probably increasing the number of unplanned pregnancies," said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party.

The incidence of abortions has fallen to its lowest level since the early 1970s, driven by increased use of contraception. To reduce the number of unplanned pregnancies and abortions, Senator Berta Gardner introduced an amendment to expand family planning as part of S.B. 49. The amendment passed with bipartisan support, but anti-contraception House Republicans have been working since last session to eliminate the provisions that would prevent unplanned pregnancies and abortions.

Since S.B. 49 was gridlocked last year, the Parnell Administration implemented it administratively, in a legally controversial move that now is under litigation. If S.B. 49 passes the legislature, the bill likely would be addressed in the pending lawsuit.

Tarr introduces bill to extend buffer between schools and alcohol

Today, in order to address student and community concerns about alcohol sales nears schools, Representative Geran Tarr introduced legislation to extend the buffer zone between schools and establishments that sell alcohol.

'Students at Clark Middle School don't like leaving school and having to maneuver around intoxicated individuals hanging around the nearby liquor store," said Tarr who decided to introduce the legislation after hearing student and parent complaints at local community council meetings. "I'm proud that the students spoke up and wanted to do something. This bill is about keeping our students safe."

Current law prohibits alcohol sales within 200 feet of schools and churches. Tarr's legislation (HB336) would increase that distance to 400 feet. Establishments licensed before the bill takes effect would be grandfathered in at the 200 feet limit.

This bill is just one small but helpful step in addressing alcoholism and the problems it causes," said Tarr. "To address the overall concern, we must recognize alcoholism as a disease, like cancer, that requires treatment for an individual to heal. I stand with Mountain View Community Council and others, including CHARR, calling for more dollars for alcohol treatment.'

The bill was referred to the House Labor and Commerce

Alaska women call on A.G. Geraghty to retract blamethe-victim statement

Geraghty said domestic violence victims were a primary reason low domestic violence prosecution rates

Anchorage: Under questioning in committee about the State of Alaska's low domestic violence prosecution rate, Attorney General Michael Geraghty blamed the victims of domestic violence. In a hearing before members of the state legislature, Geraghty said that victims of domestic violence frequently recant their charges of violence but go on to hold vendettas against their attackers. The Alaska Women for Political Action is calling on Governor Parnell to condemn his Attorney General's offensive statement.

Geraghty stated, "I can tell you, many times...and this is part of the problem...many victims don't want to – they change their minds. It may have all been a, not a prank necessarily, but a vindictive move by the victim to get back at her, at the perpetrator - her husband or significant other, or whatever." It should be noted that A. G. Geraghty and his predecessor Dan Sullivan received criticism for going to court in the Minto and Kaltag cases on the side of the abusers.

Karen Hansen, former President of AWPA, said "It is not vindictive to want a perpetrator arrested for inflicting broken bones, traumatic brain injury or the emotional trauma of domestic or sexual assault. It's the law! The Attorney General should be strongly encouraged to spend time with victims of domestic violence in any hospital facility in this state so he can get his facts straight. Alaska has the highest levels of sexual assault in the nation and appallingly low prosecution rates. Many rural communities lack any or very minimal law enforcement, meaning responses to domestic violence can take days. The Attorney General needs to reset his reality to this century, not the last Sue Levi, an AWPA board member and also a retired Probation/Parole Officer for the State of Alaska stated, "I've assisted many victims of sexual and domestic violence across our state, and I can tell you from my experience, the need for the perpetrator to be swiftly and justly prosecuted is extremely important. It also sends a message to the victims, as well as future perpetrators, that the State of Alaska is serious about sentencing abusers and protecting the victims." Levi also added that, "Perhaps in the future, it would be wise for Attorney General Geraghty to refresh his memory on the governor's banner of 'Choose Respect' when referring to our many victims of domestic violence in Alaska.

For many rookies and those who haven't experienced the trail and traveling through Alaska by dog team, it's hard to fathom the ups and downs that come with racing sled dogs. A 1,000-mile race is a hard thing to wrap one's mind around. Although Keith has lived and trained in Kotzebue for several years, she admits she has no idea what to expect. "I put it together in my brain as two 440's with a 24-hour rest in the middle, that is how I'm breaking it up so that I know when I have the high's and the lows. I don't know what to expect. I focus on having enough confidence in me and the dogs to get through whatever trail conditions we

Being mentored by John Baker, she said, she'll remember one of his mottos to get her through challenging times. "If you think you can, you can. If you think you can't, you can't. I'm gonna remember that one. Once you're out there, things can get pretty low, and you can get pretty bummed out and the dogs can look like the worst dogs in the world," she said. "The challenge for me is to turn that around and be real confident so that the dogs can pick up on that. As a musher it's our responsibility to manage the team properly and that includes not just running them in the right way but also caring for their mental status."

What sounds like a rough 10 to 12 days on the trail is viewed by long-time Iditarod mushers as a way of life and they wouldn't have it any other way.

Take Jeff King. He tried to "retire" from the Iditarod in 2011, but came back the next year. Asked what the running of sled dogs means to him, he sighed, and then said, "I love my dogs. I have great dogs, they are dogs I raised from puppies. It's clear, I'm kind of a junkie to dogs and the outdoors and I like competition and I can't image walking away from something that I get so much joy out of. The dogs, the trail, the competition, the people in this beautiful state, the combination is pretty special and I have been blessed with good health and until I can't do it anymore, I can't imagine not doing it."

SHOWTIME— Hugh Neff of Tok waves the Alaska flag as he returns to the Iditarod after taking a break in 2013, when he was competing in the Norwegian long distance sled dog race Finnmarksløpet.

WHOA — Iditarod rookie Monica Zappa and second sled rider, Yukon Quest champion Tim Osmar, round the corner of 4th Avenue and Cordova in dramatic style.

FANS — Iditarod fans lined 4th Avenue in Anchorage to catch a glimpse of the 69 Iditarod teams embarking on this year's race.

Dramatic race has Jeff King scratch, Aliy Zirkle places second as windstorm wreaks havoc on last miles of trail

By Diana Haecker

Usually winners of the 1,000-mile Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race have an inkling that they will cross the finish line first. Most of the time they can prepare for several miles as they approach the distant lights of Nome to revel in the notion of victory and the glory that comes with it.

Not so the 2014 Champion, Dallas Seavey, who arrived in Nome on Tuesday morning at 4:04 a.m.

When the 26-year-old and his dog team moved onto Front Street, Seavey ran along side his sled all the way to the burled arch. There he collapsed on the sled, with a blank, exhausted expression on his face. Seavey then rested his head on the handlebar oblivious of all the hoopla going on around him and proceeded to take off his bib number 14.

Race marshal Mark Nordman, gently put the bib back on him.

While fans lining the finisher's chute went crazy with walrus whoops, Dallas' wife Jen made her way through the camera crews that surrounded him and gave him a hug.

Seavey recovered enough to get up from the sled and walked to his dogs, beginning at the wheel dog to rub down one after the other.

A cameraman asked him, if he knew what he just did.

"You just won the race," the cam-

Cameraman: "Behind you."

eraman said.

"Huh. I didn't know. I just run my team, dude. What can I tell you?" Seavey said, as he petted his team dogs, still in a daze about his comefrom-behind victory.

Seavey arrived with six dogs on the gangline and one dog in the sled.

He shattered the record set by John Baker in 2011 and raced the Iditarod trail from Willow to Nome in 8 days, 13 hours, 4 minutes and 19

But he had not much time to let the achievement sink in.

Aliy Zirkle, driving a team that was poised for an Iditarod victory for three years in a row, made it onto Front Street.

Two minutes and 22 seconds after Seavey's finish, Aliy Zirkle arrived under the burled arch.

Quito, her small female leader pranced into the chute with a spring in her step and her head held high. She ran up the ramp in single lead, leading Zirkle's team of 10 dogs to the finish line.

There they were two teams, parked next to each other.

Seavey's handlers fed meat snacks to his team, Zirkle's dogs inquired if they could have the meat that a Seavey team dog did not eat.

At first, Aliy Zirkle did not speak. She smiled, greeted her mother and

Dear Editor:

In the news is "Campus gun bill before committee." There is nothing more important in the world for a student to get an A in their class. An armed student is in a much better position to negotiate with the teacher to get an A in class than an unarmed student. A student has to do whatever they have to do to get that A in class. Alaska needs their students to get as many A's as possible and if that means arming students to get an A, well so be it.

John Suter Chugiak, AK 99567

Dear Editor:

In the back pages of last week's Nome Nugget newspaper I read an article entitled "Alaska women call on A.G. (State Attorney General) Geraghty to retract blame-the-victim statement" in disbelief. It seems crazy that the governor's top law enforcement officer could go on TV and proclaim that the victims of domestic violence are just out on an vendetta against their husbands or significant others, and weren't really hurt by getting beat up.

The State of Alaska has one of the lowest rates of prosecution on domestic violence cases in the nation, and both this attorney general and the last one, Dan Sullivan, have been going to court to defend the abusers in specific cases. Add to that Lisa Murkowski's amendment to exempt Alaska from parts of the National Violence Against Women Act, last year, and you get a pattern in Alaska's government that is counter to our governor's public campaign of 'Choose Respect' when it come to domestic violence and abuse to anyone, but especially women.

I know we are long past the "double speak" of the novel 1984, but Governor Sean Parnell's continued support of both his attorney general and Senator Murkowski in these instances seems very hypocritical. What is he really thinking, trying to convince us of, or maybe getting us not to notice?

From my viewpoint this isn't the only place where our governor is saying one thing for our state's purpose and condoning another. It seems to be happening with our oil revenue, education, and the Medicare extension, as well. Should we call these and many of his other acts, his mastery of the "slight of tongue" technique? It's something like the card tricks or find the pea games you see in movies about the Big Hustle, only with his mouth instead of his hands. As in the Wizard of OZ, are we supposed to ignore the man behind the curtain and just see the image he wants us to look at? Then again, your editorial said all this very well last week, just in a different way. Keep up the good work!

Politicians can learn from the dogs

Politics can take a lesson from Iditarod. To run the Iditarod Sled Dog Race takes planning, training and leadership. A dog team needs a leader, swing dogs, team dogs, wheel dogs and a good driver. With these fellas working as a unit there is victory, when they are not working as a unit there is nothing but a tangled mess of flying fur and snarls and a runaway sled. Mushers don't finish the Iditarod Race if they haven't put together a tough team. Even then, nature can deal some cruel blows.

Juneau and Washington can learn a lesson from Iditarod. In Washington there are a lot of junkyard dogs that just don't have the ability to see the value of teamwork. They dig in and claim they are sticking to their political ideology and won't bite the hand that feeds them. The smell of money figures into their stubbornness. We lack visionaries who have the good of the nation as their goal. We need powerful swing dogs that can persuade their colleagues to understand the goal, team dogs that can bring the process to fulfillment and wheel dogs with the muscle to overcome hurdles.

This year's Iditarod Race is one of the most challenging in recent years - no snow, open water, dangerous slopes, treacherous ice and high winds. Not all competitors will arrive in Nome, the trail takes its toll, but those who finish will thank their dogs for getting them through the burled arch in one piece. So, Juneau and Washington - line up and hit the trail. Teamwork gets the job done. - N.L.M.-

History by Laura Samuelson with photo courtesy of the Carrie M. McLain memorial Museum HOW IT ALL BEGAN – Nome's 408 mile "All Alaska Sweepstakes" to Candle and return had its first running in 1908. It was the first long distance sled dog race in the world. This is Leonhard Seppala being greeted by the crowd on Front Street as he won the eighth Sweepstakes on April 17, 1915. If you look closely at Seppala in the white parka in the center of the photo you will see "Fritz" sniffing someone important. Fritz now lives permanently at Nome's Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum.

Ice miner survives carbon monoxide: 911call leads to rescue by Nome emergency crews

By Nancy McGuire

It was 6:30 a.m. Sunday March 2 and time for a shift change. Bobby Lowe, 28, had been mining for gold beneath the Bering Sea ice for seven hours. Lowe and his tender, 30-yearold Matthew Foy had been mining in a plastic covered shack on the ice just past the Ft. Davis Roadhouse.

Lowe, in his heated diving gear, had just surfaced and saw his tender, Foy, get up to check some gauges. Things were normal, as usual, and then Lowe saw Foy fall over. Foy was foaming at the mouth, cherry red, incoherent. Lowe said, "He completely seized up. Foy is a big guy. I couldn't move him. I found his cell phone and called 911. I knew something was really wrong.'

Lowe stayed on the phone with the police dispatcher and stepped out into the 14°F fresh bone-chilling air. He was still in his diving gear so went back inside the shack. He saw NPD's Sgt. Byron Redburn arrive and waited. When he saw the ambulance arrive he jumped on his 4wheeler and met them at the road to explain the situation.

Redburn assessed the situation as the Nome Volunteer Ambulance arrived and EMT /Firefighter Jimmy West, Jr. was a first responder. West determined that the Fire Department with their rescue gear was needed. The NVFD crew carried gear and got Foy on a stretcher and gave him oxygen. West said that as soon as Fov got oxygen into his system he began to perk up and was conversant as he was transported to Norton Sound Hospital.

Lowe described the ice shack as a 10 X 20 ft frame covered with plastic. There were two rooms and inside were a 23 hp Vanguard gasoline engine, a gasoline air compressor and a diesel hot water heater that pumped 130°F water into the diving suits. The plastic shack was sealed tight with a bungee cord, so there was no ventilation and the shack filled with carbon monoxide fumes.

Foy was sent to Anchorage to be in a hyperbaric chamber, but it was determined he would be fine with just oxygen. Foy will not be allowed to dive until the CO in his blood reaches an acceptable level.

Lowe and Foy are part of a loosely organized crew of four who had been in operation for only two days. They were mining on state land and did not have an APMA number. Their ice shack was about 800-1,000 ft offshore where the Beam Road meets the Nome Council Highway.

The Nome Fire Department cautions miners about the need for ventilation when using machinery in a closed structure.

West chuckles as he says it's a good thing the wind blew the ice out so that there will be fewer ice shacks

Nome Trading Co. closing its doors

Nome residents have been packing closeout deals out of Nome Trading Co. since store staff announced its upcoming closure last week. Owner of the grocery and general merchandise operation, Wards Cove Packing of Seattle, has its Alaska village stores put and its large office, marina and industrial properties on Seattle's Lake Union up for sale.

The company owns stores, including the buildings, in Naknek and in Hoona, Alaska. Wards Cove does not own the store building in Nome, which is owned by Sitnasuak Native Corp., hence this store was closing, according to the Nome store manager, James Standish. A new owner would not want to take on an operation to pay rent, according to  $\bar{\text{James}}$ Standish, Nome Trading's manager who worked up the ranks from night can stocker in 2011

"I have worked all the jobs. I met a lot of good people here," Standish said. Seven employees, including Standish, will be out of jobs and the store on East Front Street out of business as soon as merchandise is cleared by local sales or transferred to the Naknek store, according to Standish.

Nome Trading Co. opened in August 2008 under manager Bill Cash. Standish took over a year-and-a-half ago when Cash retired. Country Store, owned by SNC, previously occupied the site.

The property's future is open, according to David Hoffman, SNC CEO. "We have no current plans, but we are looking for a new tenant, Hoffman said Monday. "We are open to new ideas for use of the building and would definitely consider selling

Wards Cove's fishing assets have been owned in a joint venture by a subsidiary of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. since

Two brothers, Harold A. and A. W. Brindle founded the company in 1928 when they bought a small salmon cannery on a bay named Ward Cove outside of Ketchikan. The Brindle family sold that operation in 2003. Other fishing assets passed into Alaska ownership in 2011 when Wards Cove sold them to BSAI Partners, LLC, a joint venture between Siu Alaska Corp. and Coastal Villages Pollock, wholly owned subsidiaries of the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. (NSEDC) and Coastal Villages Region Fund (CVRF), respectively.

Siu Alaska and Coastal Villages are two of Alaska's Community Development Quota groups. The joint venture gained seven trawl vessels, one crab boat and 2.9 percent of the allowable catch of pollock in the Bering Sea fishery. BSAI Partners have never owned any of the Wards Cove village stores. The transaction did include ownership of Alaska Boat Co., the company that manages the vessels gained in the purchase.

Wards Cove Packing Co., established 86 years ago, was once one of Alaska's largest fish processing companies with a work force of around 3,000 employees—many seasonal at the height of the fishing season. Wards Cove had nine canneries in Alaska and other seafood operations. The company stopped salmon processing in 2002 following several years of losses due to a glut in the salmon market, according to company officials. The company continued to participate in Bering Sea Pollock, crab and cod fisheries. By 2011, Wards Cove had sold its seafood operations, and began renovating some of its Seattle lakeshore properties into marinas and high-rise buildings.

Nome JR. High students build qayaq

By Diana Haecker

Master qayaq builder Maligiaq Padilla of Greenland is no stranger to Nome. For the second time in less than a year, Padilla has traveled to Nome and the region in order to teach students how to build a bona fide qayaq from scratch.

Last summer, Padilla helped NACTEC students to build two gayages

Nome Eskimo Community had received a grant from the federal Dept. of Education for Alaska Native Education, which allowed Padilla to come to Nome to teach students in the art of qayaq building.

NCC's Marsha Sloan explained that the goal of the grant was to integrate Native cultural connections with math and science in the classroom. Last week, about 20 students from grades 7 and 8 were involved in building the 17 ft by 22 in. qayaq, which will be used by Nome Public Schools students to practice paddling the skinny vessel and rolling it in the Nome pool.

Padilla said he has visited 24 schools in Alaska so far, spreading his vast knowledge of qayaq building to communities like Wales, Shishmaref, Savoonga, Gambell, St. Michael, Unalakleet, Teller and Nome. He has plans to come back to Nome in June to coach more students to build qayaqs in the Inupiat and Greenland way.

To celebrate the 7th and 8th graders' achievement, community members, elders from the XYZ and parents gathered for a reindeer stew potluck on Friday at Nome-Beltz Jr./Sr. High School.

Iditarod Trail Invitational cyclists break record by a week

By Diana Haecker

In a time when sport records are broken by seconds or milliseconds, Iditarod Trail Invitational cyclist Jeff Oatley of Fairbanks accomplished a feat that winter ultra marathon enthusiasts call mind-boggling.

Oatley shaved seven days off the all time record to finish the Iditarod Trail Invitational from Knik to Nome in 10 days, 2 hours and 53 minutes.

Aidan Harding of the United Kingdom came in second and made the course in 11 days, four hours and 15 minutes.

Nome's Phil Hofstetter finished the race in third place, clocking also a record-breaking time of 12 days and six hours. Hofstetter won the 1,000-mile winter ultra sport race in 2010 in a time of 17 days and nine hours.

Hofstetter is doing this as a hobby, as he leads a busy life as a family man and having a demanding job as the Vice President of Hospital Services of the regional Norton Sound Health Corporation.

"My goal this year was to finish the race and to better my time from 2010," said Hofstetter. He achieved both goals, but the race is much more than beating the clock. The Iditarod Trail Invitational is a human-powered race that pits 55 selected super athletes against what Alaska's winter wilderness can throw at them.

The race has a 350-mile version, which ends in McGrath and the full version, which ends in Nome. This year, 33 athletes raced to McGrath, 22 signed up for the race to Nome.

This year's snowless trail conditions favored the cyclists, who use fat-tire bikes to pedal pretty much across the same trail that the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog race uses.

The Iditarod Trail Invitational starts a week prior to the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog race.

As dog teams set a blistering pace and are on record-breaking speed bound to Nome, the ultra marathon athletes also had a fast, yet challenging trail to master.

Phil Hofstetter said he took it easy from the start in Knik to ease himself into the rac

He had caught the flu around Christmas time, which set him back on clocking miles during that crucial training time to build up strength and endurance. "At the start I waited for five minutes to let the others go and then held back a lot in the beginning to get my body used to riding," Hofstetter said.

Right off the bat, the race set off at a blistering speed. Trail conditions were hard and fast, and the bikers didn't have to push their bikes hardly at all. The bikers navigated the icy trail and the white-knuckle ride on glare ice at the Farewell Lakes with studded bike tires to provide some grip. However, despite the studs, Hofstetter said he wiped out several times, got blown off his bike by strong winds on the glare ice of Golovin Bay and crashed on glaciated icy trail sections.

Hofstetter made it to McGrath in two days and 20 hours. He said he had a few issues with a new drive gear, swelling knees and bad saddle sores that prevented him from sitting down on the saddle since the checkpoint of Ophir.

While the race organization has drop locations in McGrath, Ophir and near Cripple, the racers sent their drop bags to post offices along the Yukon River. Hofstetter, however, arrived on the Yukon on a weekend, and couldn't pick up his drop bags at the post offices. He ended up buying store food instead of consuming nutritionally dense power food, which may have contributed to exacerbating his knee trouble.

Hofstetter said the swelling of his knees caught up with him past Kaltag and forced him to stop at Tripod Cabin way before Unalakleet. Unlike the Iditarod Sled Dog race, the Iditarod Trail Invitational athletes don't carry tracker devices and the bikers spread out, racing each other in a vacuum. "It's very lonely," said Hofstetter.

Coming out of Shaktoolik enroute to Koyuk, Hofstetter had a flat tire and needed to fix it while the winds were blowing straight at him at 20 to30 miles per hour.

"Normally we mesh with the Iditarod mushers and have some traffic there, but we were so early," said Hofstetter. Thus, there was not much traffic on the trail and fighting the stiff north wind, Hofstetter followed a wrong set of snowmachine tracks that led him off the trail. In addition Hofstetter had an issue with his eyes and couldn't see clearly. "I was worried that I had frostbit my eyes," he said.

Finally, he made out the Island Point landmark and biked cross-country to the point, where he knew was a shelter cabin that he used to rest up for five hours and regroup.

After the difficult Shaktoolik to Koyuk crossing, things didn't ease up. Strong winds continued to blow him off the bike at Golovin Bay and the Elim hills. While the Topkok hills also proved tough due to ice on tundra, Hofstetter pushed on.

He said the last 30 miles were among the roughest of the entire course. "After Rohn snow is always sparse, but it was bad this year. On the Yukon, it seemed we had a normal amount of snow. However, coming up the coast it was bad. I haven't seen it like this since 2003. Roads in every single village were just glare ice," Hofstetter reported on trail conditions.

Hofstetter arrived in Nome on Friday evening, around 8 p.m., being welcomed home by wife Sarah and his children Joe and Hahnah.

Despite record setting accomplishments, the experience was a painful one. Hofstetter still is recovering from his saddle sores and the knee swelling. Why did he do this?

"I think we do this to go out there and learn something about yourself that you bring back and apply to your life," Hofstetter said. "You challenge yourself and improve what you're doing." What did he learn this year? "I learned to never underestimate the trail," Hofstetter said. "Unexpected things can happen."

Dear Editor:

The Postmaster General just announced he is reversing postage rate increases for rural Alaska, following a meeting with Senator Mark Begich. This is the latest example of Senator Begich working for us.

Alaska has always faced people in Washington, DC making decisions for us without any understanding of how things work here. From attempts to lock up resources to proposals to shut down rural mail service, it is rare that a day goes by in Washington without a Lower 48 politician proposing policies that hurt Alaska. We need good elected officials who understand Alaska and will fight for us.

During the recent debate on postal issues, Senator Begich didn't just keep our postage rates affordable. He also helped pass amendments to keep rural post offices open and expand Alaska Bypass Mail. Bypass mail is critical for affordable shipments of medical supplies, equipment, and groceries to rural Alaska. Even though some in Washington have tried to eliminate bypass mail, Senator Begich actually expanded it.

Senator Begich has played a key role in creating more resource-based jobs in rural Alaska. He has supported Bristol Bay fishermen's efforts to protect that fishery, which employs 14,000 people. Our rural economy depends on fishing, which is why Senator Begich has supported the Bristol Bay fishery and opposed the Pebble Mine.

Senator Begich has played a key role in expanding other mines, however. Thanks to expansion of mines like Red Dog, the number of mining jobs in Alaska has grown 13 percent while the senator has been in office. Continuing to develop resource-based jobs like mining and fishing can bring more jobs to rural Alaska.

Rural Alaska is home to many veterans and Alaska Natives. One of Senator Begich's accomplishments is a new partnership between the Veterans Administration and the Indian Health Service. Under this new agreement, Alaska veterans can get treated at Indian Health Service facilities and the facilities will be reimbursed by the VA. As a result, veterans can get health care closer to home, saving money while improving care. This partnership also strengthens Alaska Native health care facilities.

Right now, we have a bipartisan Congressional delegation. Republicans have power in the House, and Democrats have power in the Senate and White House. With a bipartisan delegation, Alaska has more clout—Senator Begich's record is an indication of our clout. Let's keep that bipartisan delegation working together. Otherwise, politicians in Washington will start making decisions without putting Alaska first.

Respectfully, Barb Angaiak, Bethel, AK

Dear Nancy,

The conventional wisdom is that contraception reduces unplanned pregnancies and the more readily contraception is available, the fewer the number of abortions. Let me offer a different perspective to the one offered in your coverage of S.B. 49 found on page 18 of the March 6 issue of the Nome Nugget.

Based on information primarily available at the Respect Life Program pages of the USCCB website, there are a number of reasons to argue that contraception is very unhealthy and in fact counter productive:

• The World Health Organization has classified synthetic estrogen and progestin in contraceptives as carcinogenic to humans. According to a major study, women who use oral contraceptives before age 20 have a 1.95 elevated risk of developing breast cancer.

• Among the less common side

Western Alaska skiers have week of Olympic proportions

By Keith Conger

Kids who grow up skiing near the Bering Sea just don't know anything different - hard snow, icy conditions, skiing on snowmachine trails, and big winds just seem natural to them. So when Annie Connelly, an experienced Besh Cup ski racer from Eagle River, saw the kids from the Nome Ski and Biathlon team zipping around the wind battered tundra in wind-chill temperatures well below zero, she was nothing short of amazed.

"These kids are way, way tougher that the kids around Anchorage," stated Connelly, who was visiting Nome as a part of NANANordic, an organization run by two-time United States Olympic cross-country ski racer Lars Flora.

Connelly, and a group of high caliber Alaskan ski racers, were in Nome last week to promote crosscountry skiing in rural Alaska. The group spent five days at Nome Elementary School taking over 150 fourth, fifth, and sixth grade students out on skis. The group also conducted ski clinics for school kids on the weekend, spent a day skiing with the Nome Ski and Biathlon team on Newton Peak, and conducted two days of teaching at ski team practices.

Flora, who represented his country at the 2002 Olympics in Salt Lake City, the 2006 Olympics in Torino, Italy, and has competed in World Cup ski races all around the world, started travel with the rural outreach ski program in the winter of 2012. Groups led by Flora visited 11 villages in 2013, and were able to get 1,500 kids on skis, most for the very

"We enjoy seeing kids get out racing," says Flora, "but our main mission is really to teach the lifelong sport of cross-country skiing to rural Alaskan kids." NANANordic will be traveling to Shishmaref later this

While NANANordic was traveling north to the Seward Peninsula to give instruction, two accomplished western Alaskan high school biathletes were traveling south to get instruction from former United States Biathlon Team member Zachary Hall at Anchorage's Kincaid Park.

Rosa Schmidt, a member of Nome Ski and Biathlon, and Katie Daniels, a member of the Unalakleet ski and biathlon team, are both getting ready to attend the Arctic Winter Games in Fairbanks in two weeks. Both athletes made Team Alaska's biathlon squad (Schmidt in ski biathlon, and Daniels in snowshoe biathlon) by their qualification results at last year's rural state biathlon

The pair was really supposed to only get a small bit of instruction from Hall before attending a biathlon race at Kincaid. Due to warm weather, however, the race was cancelled, and the pair ended up getting a full day of shooting lessons from the Hall, who will also serve as one of Team Alaska's biathlon coaches at the Arctic Winter Games. "The time with Zach was great," said Schmidt. "He really helped me figure some things out about shooting in the standing position.'

AND THEY'RE OFF - Participants in the Koyuk Invitational leave the starting line for a challenging journey due to the rough trail conditions the area has seen this winter.

Regional skiers conquer challenging conditions at Koyuk Invitational

Over 40 skiers from western Alaska braved this year's icy ski conditions at the annual Koyuk Invitational Ski and Biathlon Meet this past weekend. All four age group categories saw the same athlete win each of the two events.

Unalakleet's Fisher Dill won his first gold medal ever by triumphing in the 3-kilometer ski race on day one. His winning time was a whopping 2 minutes 27 seconds faster than silver medalist Vadim Yenan of Unalakleet's Michael Haugen took the bronze.

Dill's margin of victory in the biathlon race on day two was much narrower. Hotshot shooter Haugen came within 23 seconds of snatching the gold as he hit all five of his shots, despite the very windy conditions. Yenan was the bronze medalist. Nome's Kenneth Hafner came in fourth place in both events.

The junior high girls division saw Nome's Mallory Conger earn the first of her two gold medals by outlasting White Mountain skier Felicia Ione and Unalakleet skier Summer Sagoonick on day one in the ski race. Conger's time would have earned her a silver medal in the boys divi-

Day two saw a pair of Unalakleet biathlon medals. Both Jewel Wilson and Kailyn Haugen out shot all the race favorites to earn silver and

The biathlon results of Wilson and Haugen were nearly enough for the Unalakleet girls to wrestle the team award from the Nome girls. To win the team trophy, Nome needed the 4th place ski race finish of Shayna Warnke-Green, and the 5th place biathlon finish of Erin Johanson.

Nome high school skiers Junyor Erickson and Alexis Hutson won their respective divisions. Nome's Emelyne Hobbs took second place in both races.

The athletes to "shoot clean" (hitting five out of five shots with a .22 caliber rifle at a 4.5 inch target from 50 meters) were Michel Haugen, Kailyn Haugen, Unalakleet teammate Karlee Katchatag and Savoonga's Evelyn Iya.

The Koyuk Invitational is the annual tune-up race for the regional Bering Strait School District ski and biathlon meet in White Mountain, which will take place on March 20, 21, and 22.

Helpful hints for filling out your Indian Exemption paperwork

The Indian Status Exemption paperwork that releases Alaska Native and American Indian people from Affordable Care Act requirements is now available. Please complete this document to avoid a tax penalty!

IMPORTANT NOTE: If you are applying for the Indian Status Exemption, you have the entire year of 2014 to submit this application. However, we suggest that you complete the exemption paperwork and mail it no later than October 1, 2014, to ensure that the federal government has enough time to process your application. We encourage you to do this as soon as possible to avoid any delays.

Helpful hints to complete the Indian Status Exemption application:

- 1) Print out exemption application at:
  - http://marketplace.cms.gov/getofficialresources/publications-and-articles/tribal-exemption.pdf
- Print an extra copy of the "Step 2" page from the application for your spouse, and each of your children or others in your family who are Alaska Native and/or American Indian. You will need to complete a separate "Step 2" page for each member of your family you claim on your taxes.
- 2) What to include with your exemption application:
- A copy of one of the following for each person you are filing for;
  - Tribal Enrollment Card or Letter
  - Proof of ANCSA (Regional or Village) Shareholder Status
  - Certificate of Indian Blood (CIB) Card issued by the Bureau of Indian Affairs
- If you don't have one of the items above, you can also visit your local Tribal clinic for a "Letter of Eligibility to Receive Care"
- Send copies only. Do not send original cards or documents. These items will not be returned.
- 3) Here is a document that provides additional instructions and helpful hints: http://anthctoday.org/aca/Indian_Status_Exemption.pdf
- 4) Keep a photocopy of the entire application and forms for your personal records.
- 5) What happens next?
- You will receive an Exemption Certificate Number from the Health Insurance Marketplace that you'll put on your federal Income tax return.
  - This is for your 2014 taxes that you will file in 2015.
  - Keep this certificate number in a safe place as it is how you will avoid the tax penalty.
- If you don't receive the certificate information, call the Health Insurance Marketplace Help Center at 1/800-318-2596.

NSHC Patient Benefits will be traveling to our surrounding villages to assist with the Tribal exemption.

ICE MUSHING— Four-time Iditarod champion Martin Buser of Big Lake mushes his dog team along the hills just outside of Unalakleet on Saturday, March 8. Buser reached the checkpoint along the Bering Sea Coast in second place, just under one hour behind eventual second place finisher Aliy Zirkle. Iditarod 2014 champion Dallas Seavey reached Unalakleet in 11th place, over eight hours behind Zirkle.

Unalakleet hosts Bering Sea Conference basketball tourney

By Jeff Erickson

With 22 teams playing 38 games over five days the Bering Sea Conference basketball tournament was arguably the largest high school conference tournament in Alaska history. Two hundred ten student athletes descended on Unalakleet accompanied by planeloads of fans that wanted to witness the exciting and momentous event.

The girls tournament featured the two-time defending regional champion Shishmaref Northern Lights who returned a strong veteran core with the addition of Debra Hersrud, a physical forward who'd played in Noorvik previously.

The Teller Lady Aklaqs were the second seed, and the only team that had played the SNL team close all year long. But other teams eyed the prize: a trip to Anchorage for each of the two state tournament berths.

Early round games went according to seed placements and the top teams moved in. Fans were treated to the long range shooting displays of the shorthanded Savoonga Lady Huskies Denae Kingeekuk and the physical play of Golovin's Alice Amaktoolik and St. Michael's Deidre Levi. New stars were also emerging in Shaktoolik and Koyuk creating a feeling of transition.

Nothing could stop the Northern Lights display as the ladies from Shishmaref steamrolled the competition behind Hersrud, and fellow All-Tournament selections Jessica Kuzuguk and Denise Fernandez. They rolled to the title over the rival Aklaqs who fell to the "True Second" game on Saturday to play the winner of the loser's bracket. The blue-clad Lady Aklaqs came out against their nemesis, the Golovin Lady Lynx (who had upset them in the 2013 tournament) with their game faces on. Team MVP Jazzlyn Garnie continued her impressive tournament play and teammate Kaitlyn Topkok dominated the frontcourt with aggressive rebounding and scoring. Teller advanced to their first state tournament appearance.

On the boys' side the options were endless. Almost every one of the 12 teams had legitimate reason to be optimistic. While the Wolverines from Shaktoolik had skated through the season with only a single loss to a conference team, there were many others who had reasonable aspirations of a trip to Anchorage. The three-time defending district champion Golovin Lynx was the first to feel the bite of an upstart team as the young Huskies from Brevig Mission came back from a large deficit to defeat the purple and gold. High-octane offenses met intense defensive pressure as transition basketball prevailed providing the packed bleachers with entertaining displays of "March Madness." Youthful players emerged and veterans led their squads into battle. Multiple overtime games and nail biting finishes were the rule on the boy's side of the tournament. The Shishmaref Northern Lights shone brightly after an up and down season using the smooth backcourt play of senior David Olanna and the frenetic pace of Corey Ningeulook to dispatch favored Gambell and Brevig Mission and be the surprise team of the tournament. Their championship matchup would be with the top seeded Wolverines, who had escaped a valiant upset bid from the young Elim Eagles in the semi-finals.

Shaktoolik opened strong and maintained a double-digit lead until the 4th quarter led by outstanding performances from Vernon Rock and freshman Everson Paniptchuk. An injury to the very important Melvin Hunt gave the Northern Lights a glimmer of hope and they stormed back to cut the lead to single digits, but they could never overcome the deficit and the championship went to the maroon clad Wolverines.

The Golovin team had recovered from the early loss to win 4 games including narrow victories over Elim and Brevig Mission. Sherman was helped by brilliant long range shooting by Peter Olson and Oswald Moses, and his back strain seemed to be healing as the days progressed. He attacked the Shishmaref defense relentlessly in the "True Second" game. When they played off him he drained three-point shots, when they played tight he went to the basket with aggression. His 55 points were a large reason that the Lynx punched their ticket for a four-year-in-a-row to the state tournament.

The four teams will travel to Anchorage March 13 to participate in the 16 team state tournament that starts on Saturday, March 15.

Nanooks Secure Second Place at Tournament, Will Play at State

By Sarah Miller

Though the championship title eluded the Nanooks, both the boys' and girls' teams represented Nome well on the court at this weekend's Western Conference Tournament in Anchorage.

The Lady Nanooks played number one seed Barrow in their first game on Thursday, losing 56-40, despite the efforts of Ariana Horner with 14 points, and Senora and Addy Ahmasuk, who each put 10 points on the board. Friday's game against Bethel also saw the Lady Nanooks defeated, 31-27. The Ahmasuk sisters again were lead scorers in the game, with Addy putting up 15 for the team and Senora contributing 10 points. The girls' team ended their season with a 7-15 record. Barrow and Bethel went on to win first and second place in the tournament. Both Senora (sophomore) and Addy (senior) Ahmasuk were named to the all-tournament team. Senior Addy Ahmasuk was also named to the All-Western Conference Team, a team selected by the coaches and based upon performance over the season. Other players named to the team were Angela Miguel (Barrow MVP), Rose Mongoyuk (Barrow), Riana Joseph (Bethel), and Mary-Sue Hyatt (Kotzebue). Ahmasuk also won the girls' free throw contest.

The boys' team began the tournament facing off against Barrow for the fifth time in two weeks. The Nanooks had a slow start, leading by only one point at halftime, 17-16. The pace of the game picked up in the second half and Nome used its defense to hold the Whalers to only 9 points, defeating them 42-25. Cass Mattheis and Klay Baker led the team in scoring with 18 and 10 points. The win sent the Nanooks to the championship game against Bethel on Friday. The Nanooks put up a fight against the Warriors, holding a lead of 2 points at the end of the first half. Both teams built up small leads throughout the game, but the Nanooks defense was not enough to keep Theodore Naneng of Bethel from putting up 27 points in the game, 15 in the fourth quarter. Despite Tyler Eide's 16 points and 13 points from Mattheis, the Nanooks were defeated 48-40.

The loss meant that Nome would have to play against Barrow one more time in the state-tournament qualifying game on Saturday. As Coach Pat Callahan noted in an email, "This is a really difficult game for the team that is in our shoes to win. We just came off a very close championship game loss- a game in which we were in a position to win even late in the fourth quarter. It is very mentally challenging to get over the disappointment of the championship game loss and refocus on the task at hand. Barrow is a very good team - probably the best team in the state to not qualify for the tournament." The Nanooks struggled to keep rebounds under control, allowing Barrow to grab 19 offensive rebounds and keep the game close. However, the defensive strength of the Nanooks, led by Jake Stettenbenz and Klay Baker limited the Whalers' scoring. Eide stepped up to carry the Nanooks to victory in this critical game, with 30 points, 6 assists and a crowd-pleasing half court shot at the third quarter buzzer. Callahan commented on the shot, "This shot surprised nobody that has followed Tyler over the last four years... he has consistently made these type of buzzer beating shots." Mattheis also scored some critical second half shots that allowed the Nanooks to secure a second place berth and a trip to the Class 3A state tournament later this month. The final score was 59-47, Nome. The Nanooks' season record is currently 18-7.

Baker, Mattheis, and Eide were named to the All-Tournament Team. Eide and Mattheis were also selected to the boys All-Conference team, along with Lawrence Kaleak (Barrow), and Taylor Hoffman and Theodore Naneng of Bethel. Nome's Briar Dickson won the freethrow competition, while Baker won the three point shooting competition. The Nanooks narrowly missed earning the Team GPA award by .003 points to the Bethel Warriors. However, the boys' team was honored with the Sportsmanship Award.

Thursday, March 20 marks the beginning of the Class 3A State Tournament, in which the Nanooks will first play against number one ranked Monroe-Catholic High School of Fairbanks. This will be the Nanooks' seventh straight trip to the tournament, and as Callahan pointed out, "Eide also joins a small group of former Nanook Boys Basketball players that have played on four state qualifying teams (Tim Sullivan, Nathan Blandford, Dominique Hall, and David Stickel)". Other schools at the tournament will be Anchorage Christian School, Houston High School, Grace Christian School, Delta Junction, Sitka High School, and of course, Bethel. Games will take place at UAA, with the championship game on March 22 at the Sullivan Arena.

The Western Conference Tournament also included the Cheer Competition. The Nome-Beltz cheer team participated in competition judged on both sideline cheering as well as a half-time routine. Kotzebue was declared the winner, with second place going to Bethel's Allaryce Agloinga and Gwendolyn Trigg-Komakhuk of Nome were selected to the all-tournament cheer squad.

Social connections: People need people

An informational article submitted by Kawerak Wellness, and summarized and republished with the permission of the Center for the Study of Social Policy

People need people. Parents need people who care about them and their children, who can be good listeners, who they can turn to for wellinformed advice and who they can call on for help in solving problems. And so, the quality of social connections is important considerations in the lives of parents. Parents' relationships with family members, friends, neighbors, co-workers, community members and service providers— are valuable resources who provide:

• emotional support (e.g., affirming parenting skills or being empathic and nonjudgmental)

• informational support (e.g., providing parenting guidance or recommending a pediatric dentist)

• instrumental support (e.g., providing transportation, financial assistance or links to jobs)

• spiritual support (e.g., providing hope and encouragement)

When parents have a sense of connectedness they believe they have people who care about them as individuals and as parents; they feel secure and confident that they have others with whom they can share the joy, pain and uncertainties that come with the parenting role; they seek assistance from people they have learned to count on when faced with challenges; and they feel empowered to "give back" in their relationships. Several research studies have demonstrated that-for both mothers and fathers-high levels of emotional, informational, instrumental or spiritual support is associated with positive parental mood; positive responses to one's children; parental satisfaction, well-being and sense of being a good parent; and lower levels of anger, anxiety and depression.

On the other side of things, inadequate, conflicting or dissatisfying social connections can be the source of parental stress. For example, grandparents may be very willing sources of information and support to new parents, but their advice and ways of showing they care, may be at odds with the new parents' beliefs and preferences.

At the extreme end of poor social connections, is a lack of people parents can talk to. Some parents can develop loneliness and feelings of being disconnected from others. Social isolation of parents puts families at high risk. Loneliness may be a major stressor that stops parents from providing the quality of care to their children that parents aim for.

Constructive and supportive social connections help safeguard parents from stress and support parenting that promotes a sense of security in their young children.

Therefore, parents' high quality social connections are beneficial to both the adults and the children.

Makes Approximately (4) 1 cup servings Preparation and Cook Time: 20 minutes Difficulty Level: Easy

Recipe by Miller Health Consulting, LLC

Ingredients: 2 Tbsp. olive oil

- 3 medium, thinly sliced yellow onions
- 4 cups low-sodium beef broth 2 tsp. Worcestershire sauce
- 1 tsp. black pepper 4 slices whole wheat French bread 4 slices Swiss chees

- Directions:

  1. Heat olive oil on medium heat in a medium size stockpot. Add thinly sliced onions and cook until tender and light brown, about 8 minutes. Stir occasionally.

  1. Add beef broth, Worcestershire
  - sauce, and black pepper to the pot and bring to boil. Once boiling, reduce heat to low and simmer for 7 minutes
  - Meanwhile, place 1 slice of Swiss cheese on each slice of bread and toast until cheese is melted.
  - To serve, ladle 1 cup of soup into a bowl and place 1 slice of cheesy toast on top.

effects of hormonal contraceptives are the following: blood clots in the veins, lungs, heart, and brain, potentially causing heart attack and strokes; breast cancer; potentially life-threatening ectopic pregnancy (in which the embryo most often implants in the narrow tube between the ovary and womb); liver tumors; and ovarian cysts.

• Contraception is designed to stop a woman's body from functioning normally and this can have negative consequences when a couple wishes to conceive a child. According to a new report by the Society for Assisted Reproductive Technology, about 1.7 percent of all babies born in the U.S. in 2012 were conceived in laboratories. However, the overwhelming majority of babies conceived that way did not make it to birth. A record-breaking total of 61,470 test-tube babies were successfully born in 2012, out of 165,172 who were conceived and placed inside a womb. (LifeSite-News.com)

 People tend to take more risks when they are led to believe they can avoid the negative consequences of risky behavior through technology. Widespread contraceptive availability has actually led to more people becoming sexually active, at earlier ages, and with more sexual partners—hence more pregnancies, more abortions. 54 percent of U.S. women seeking abortions were using contraception in the month they became • Casual sex, encouraged by widely available contraception, has resulted in about 60 million Americans being infected with one or more sexually transmitted diseases.

• "Another effect that gives cause for alarm is that a man who grows accustomed to the use of contraceptive methods may forget the reverence due to a woman, and, disregarding her physical and emotional equilibrium, reduce her to being a mere instrument for the satisfaction of his own desires, no longer considering her as his partner whom he should surround with care and affection." (Paul VI, Humane

• The Nugget article also states that the incidence of abortion has fallen to its lowest level since the early 1970s, driven by increased use of contraception. Given that many studies counter this perception, one must consider other factors such as:

 More teens are remaining abstinent. Between 1998 and 2008, the percentage of girls 15-19 who ever had sex fell more than 17 percent (to 42 percent) and the percentage of boys 15-19 dropped more than 28

• Sadly one must also note that decreased abortion rates may also be a result of the increased use of abortifacient drugs that can destroy a life after conception thus eliminating the need for a surgical abortion later on.

What was missing in the article from the Nome Nugget and what would be interesting to read are the reasons why the controversial parts of S.B. 49 were eliminated by the Republicans and the House Finance Committee. Could it be they have a genuine concern for the health of women, children, and society? Respectfully,

Rev Ross Tozzi

Governor makes nomination to Fishery Council

Governor Sean Parnell nominated Simon Kinneen for consideration by the U.S. Secretary of Commerce for service on the North Pacific Fishery Management Council (NPFMC). The governor also named Ragnar Alstrom and John Moller as alter-

"Simon's strong background and experience with subsistence, sport fishing, and commercial fishing, will make a great contribution to the NPFMC," said Governor Parnell. "Each of these nominees is committed to continue to improve fishery management for the benefit of the resource, the commercial fishing industry, and for individuals who depend on the food

Kinneen, of Nome, has worked for Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation for the past 14 years in various roles, including Norton Sound fisheries research and development director, CDQ manager, chief operating officer, and most recently, vice president and quota acquisition manager. He has served on the NPFMC Advisory Panel and Non-Target Species Committee, Bering Sea Fisheries Advisory Board, Advisory Panel to the North Pacific Research Board, Marine Conservation Alliance, and various other boards relating to state and federal fisheries. Kinneen currently is NSEDC's representative to the Western Alaska Community Development Association, the federally-mandated body charged with various functions associated with the CDQ Program. He holds a bachelor's degree in fisheries science and management from the University of Alaska Fairbanks.

Alstrom, of Alakanuk, has commercially fished the Yukon River, Bering Sea, and Norton Sound for more than 35 years. He is the executive director of the Yukon Delta Fisheries Development Association. Alstrom serves on the Alakunak City Council and previously served as mayor. He is a member of the Yukon River Panel, an international panel between Canada and the Bering Sea Fishermen's Association. Alstrom also previously represented the Yukon Delta Fisheries Development Association on the conference board to the International Pacific Halibut Commission and sat on the advisory panel to the NPFMC. He also served as a board member to the Yukon River Drainage Fisheries Association.

John Moller was born in Unalaska and resides in Juneau, where he serves as senior rural affairs advisor in the Office of the Governor. He has worked for many years as a commercial fisherman, and currently owns and operates a commercial fishing vessel in Southeast Alaska. Moller also owns and manages commercial properties. He has served on a number of Alaska Native and local government community boards and committees, including four years on the Advisory Panel to the NPFMC. Moller also served for 13 years as general manager of the Aleutian Pribilof Island Community Development Association.

The NPFMC manages more than 900,000 square miles of ocean, and is responsible for managing halibut, cod, sole, and other groundfish in the Bering Sea, Gulf of Alaska, and Aleutian Islands waters. Established by the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation Act, the council is one of eight regional councils dedicated to the oversight of the nation's fisheries. The Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation Act, signed into law in 1976, empowers the U.S. Secretary of Commerce to choose the final appointee from applicants nominated by governors of

Report: Governor's education proposal continues teacher

Alaska Schools approaching 1,000 educator cuts since 2011 Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) released a report showing that, in order to avoid cutting educators a fourth year in a row, Alaska's six largest school districts need an increase of roughly four times more per-pupil funding next year than the Governor has proposed.

"As someone who grew up in foster care, I know strong schools give everyone, rich and poor, opportunity. Cutting teachers, career counselors, and other educators damages opportunity, and harms our goal of developing a well-educated workforce," Rep. Gara said.

The Governor has not increased per-student funding since 2011. A report from Legislative Research Services shows that the six largest school districts in Alaska need an average of a $314 increase in per-pupil funding from the state, known as the Base Student Allocation (BSA), to avoid laying off teachers and other staff for a fourth year in a row. Responses from the Anchorage, Fairbanks North Star Borough, Juneau, Kenai Peninsula Borough, Kodiak Island Borough, and Matanuska Susitna Borough school districts ranged from a $245 increase required by Mat-Su to over $400 required by Juneau to avoid continued cuts this coming school year.

"In the last few years in Juneau, we've seen class sizes grow, too many valuable educators forced out of the classroom, and a significant reduction in student counseling services due to budget cuts," said Representative Sam Kito III (D-Juneau). "Our schools have found ways to do more with less, but now their ability to squeeze more success out of insufficient budgets is at its limit. There's no replacement for good teachers and small class sizes. We need to make a lasting commitment to Alaska's public schools, and that means giving them the resources they can count on year after year. That's why the BSA is so important. It's what schools can count on from one year to the next so they can plan for success not fret about more painful

In order to reverse past teacher and staff cuts, and to prevent them in the future, House and Senate Democratic legislators proposed a $404 increase (SB147, HB331) to the BSA this year with an automatic adjustment in each subsequent year to account for inflation. House Democrats have voted to stop these cuts since they started in 2011.

The Governor's proposal would only avoid roughly 80 of the anticipated 350 educator cuts for this coming school year. The Governor's proposed staff cuts would be added to the loss of over 600 educators since 2011.

Senator Dyson: Drop the lattes, pop the pill

GOP Senator says birth control is affordable with "Gold-Streaked" contraception and coffee abstinence

ANCHORAGE: After voting against state-funded family planning, State Senator Fred Dyson gave a lengthy speech (VIDEO here) advocating that women abandon their "lattes" and "GoldStreak" in contraception via Alaska Airlines. Dyson was attempting to refute the fact that family planning reduces unintended pregnancies by increasing the availability of con-

Senator Dyson: "I did some research: Don't let your minds go wild here. There are a dozen places here in town at least where you can buy condoms, a dollar a piece. There are some exotic ones that are more than that, an amazing variety. And talk with the pharmacist, birth control pills are $18-30 per month. By comparison, in the vending machines down here the pop is $1.75-$2.50 per bottle. You know, 4-5 lattes will pay the $18 per month. So it is my position no one is prohibited from

Revenue Forecast

The Senate Finance Committee began meeting as soon as session started, and what a year this is shaping up to be. Our revenue forecast is bleak for this year and the next few years. As a result, the Governor submitted the FY15 operating budget request with unrestricted general funds (UGF) below the current year's budget (FY14). The Legislature expects to further reduce the UGF in the FY15 operating budget. Our Finance Budget Sub-Committees are actively meeting and working with each department's staff to identify possible savings so we can make informed decisions on the operating

Between the FY14 budget shortfall of $2.24 billion, and the FY15 anticipated shortfall of over $1 billion, and the Governor's request to pay down the retirement debt by about $3 Billion, our savings will be substantially eroded in just one year.

However, we are very fortunate that the Legislature had the foresight in the last few years to save as much as we did while revenues were high, so we do have about $16 Billion in our reserves to get us through a few years. No matter how you slice it, there will not be nearly as much funded in the budget that is passed by the Legislature this year as we have enjoyed the last seven years.

having birth control for economic reasons.'

"Telling women to stop buying lattes and use the money for birth control is absurd and offensive. Senate President Huggins and Republican Party Chairman Goldberg should call on Fred Dyson to apologize immediately," said Kay Brown, Executive Director of the Alaska Democratic Party.

In his speech, Senator Dyson gave numerous recommendations on how women could ship contraception to Alaska, including by "GoldStreaking" it on Alaska Airlines. Dyson neglected to mention that state-supported family planning could reduce the number of abortions by 360 per year, according to a recent study. In addition to reducing the number of abortions, data suggest that wider availability of contraception could reduce Alaska's highest-in-the-nation rate of certain sexually transmitted diseases.

Cyberbullying Bill clears first key hurdle

SB128, which criminalizes electronic harassment of minors, moves out of the Judiciary Committee

The Senate Judiciary committee passed Senate Bill 128, which would criminalize cyberbullying of minors.

With advances in technology and social media, harassment by electronic means, or "cyberbullying," has become increasingly prevalent. Alaska's current statutes allow for some forms of bullying to be handled within the school system, however not all bullying occurs on or near school property.

Bullying doesn't just happen at schools, it happens everywhere," said Senator Meyer. "My motivation for introducing this legislation is the horribly sad situation we are seeing in the Lower 48, where at least a dozen teen suicides have been directly linked to Facebook, e-mails and text messages sent from electronic devices our current harassment bills do not include.'

SB128 would make it illegal to send an electronic communication that insults, taunts, challenges, or intimidates a person under 18 in a manner that causes fear of physical injury, causes severe mental or emotional injury, or results in significant damage to the person's property.

According to a 2007 study conducted by Cyberbullying Research Center on 2,000 middle school students, 17.3-percent said they had been cyberbullied, while another 17.6-percent admitted to cyberbullying. Finally, 12-percent of the sample reported being both a victim and a bully.

"Senate Bill 128 starts the process of protecting our most precious resource, our children and gives schools and families the power to protect kids not only the bullied children, but the 'bullies'," said Board certified mental health nurse Arlene Briscoe in written testimony to the Judiciary Committee. "Children who are identified as bullies require help too, and by identifying these kids and setting limits on these behaviors they will hopefully get the help they need to stop this entire negative cycle.

Under SB128, people convicted of cyberbullying could spend up to 90 days in jail.

SB128 now heads to the Senate Rules Committee for further

Treadwell and Sullivan still refuse to take position on Koch brothers closing Flint Hills Refinery

Four weeks later, GOP Senate candidates still afraid to criticize billionaire outsiders

Amidst the Koch Brothers' shutdown of the Flint Hills refinery and elimination of 80 Alaska jobs, Mead Treadwell and Dan Sullivan have yet to lend support to the impacted families in Fairbanks or criticize their billionaire benefactors

"How many Alaska jobs have to be lost before Treadwell and Sullivan will stand up to the Koch Brothers," said Mike Wenstrup, Chair of the Alaska Democratic Party and resident of Fairbanks.

The Koch brothers eliminated 80 Alaska jobs by closing the Flint Hills refinery. They pulled over $100,000 in attack ads set to run the same week they closed the refinery, but now are spending $600,000 to attack Senator Begich with an ad multiple fact checkers have found to be false. While Democratic and Republican state elected officials have expressed grave concerns about the Flint Hills shutdown, Treadwell and Sullivan refuse to take a position on it.

Through a spokesperson today, Mead Treadwell tried to dodge the issue by lobbing political attacks, but his campaign failed to condemn the Koch brothers or offer any solutions to the impacted families in Fairbanks.

In addition to eliminating 80 Alaska jobs, the Koch Brothers are trying to avoid their responsibility to clean up a massive plume of sulfolane pollution that is poisoning drinking water in

Senate Democrats Call On Governor To Withdraw Ap-

SARB appointee a California resident, appointment a violation of Alaska statute

JUNEAU - Monday, members of the Senate Democratic Caucus called on Governor Parnell to withdraw his appointment of Dennis Mandel, of Salinas, California, to the State Assessment Review Board.

'State law is extremely clear on this point. Members of state boards must be state residents. Mandell is not a state resident, and his appointment must be withdrawn. While some question Mandell's professional qualifications as an assessor or his ability to be impartial given his past employment as an oil industry executive, these questions do not disqualify Mandell from service. Mandell's established state of residency precludes him from serving on an Alaskan board or commission," stated Senator Hollis French (D-Anchorage).

AS 39.05.100 states that "[a] person appointed to a board or commission of state government shall be and have been before the last general election, (1) a registered voter in the state, if the appointment is made at large or (2) a registered voter from the judicial district, if the appointment is made from a specific judicial district.'

Mandell began serving on the State Assessment Review Board on March 1, at which time he was both a registered voter and a resident of the state of California.

House passes bill allowing arming of VPSOs HB199 offers avenue for Native corps to train up officers

Monday, March 10, 2014, Juneau, Alaska - The Alaska House of Representatives today passed a bill by Rep. Bryce Edgmon to allow Village Public Safety Officers, or VPSOs, to carry firearms. House Bill 199 establishes the Legislature's clear intent that VPSOs should have all the tools they need as law enforcement officers to carry out their duties.

'House Bill 199 will make the state's support for this policy clear and unambiguous," Edgmon, D-Dillingham, said. "All VPSOs that will carry firearms will receive extensive additional screening, training and equipment. It is my strong belief that it's unreasonable to continue to ask these men and women to put their lives in harm's way without being fully equipped to protect themselves."

The bill would expand VPSO training through the Alaska Dept. of Public Safety's State Trooper Academy in Sitka, and make sure candidates meet the standards set forth by the Alaska Police Standards Council, which is what all State Troopers and municipal police officers receive. The bill doesn't require VPSOs to be armed, it just allows the regional Native associations and communities served by VPSOs to make that choice.

"The wishes of the individual communities must be respected," Edgmon said. "Everyone involved must have a thorough understanding of the issues surrounding arming these officers. Arming these first responders, who sometimes because of weather face hours or even days before Trooper back-up arrives, will have a deterrent effect and make our communities

Since HB 199 was introduced last session, the Dept. of Public Safety has drafted regulations to allow properly trained VPSOs to carry firearms while on duty. The regulations also detail training and oversight. Edgmon said efforts are underway between the Department and Native associations to ensure the highest standards of applicability and evaluation will be used if

The VPSO program was started in the late 1970s as a way to provide communities in rural Alaska with local public safety services in areas where there was no local or State Trooper pres-

HB 199 now moves to the Alaska Senate for consideration.

RUNNING— Dallas Seavey runs alongside his sled and dog team towards the Burled Arch to the finish line.

family, went to Dallas to give him a hug and congratulate him, but did not say much.

Emotions of coming in second for the third time, so close to posting this elusive win that keeps on being snatched away from her, must have been overwhelming.

But those emotions were mixed with the sheer relief of having made it safely to the end of the trail.

While this race is going into the history books as the year of glare ice and bare tundra trails, the front runners faced brutal winds, which the coast is known for and feared for.

What seemed like a slam-dunk for Jeff King turned into a nightmare for the four-time champion. King was the first to leave White Mountain at 3:02 p.m. He had posted faster run times between Elim and White Mountain than Zirkle, and Zirkle left White Mountain an hour after King, at 4 p.m. on Monday evening, the National Weather Service got reports from the weather station at Johnson's camp near Topkok that winds out of the north-northeast averaged 30 mph, then increased to 38 mph, gusting to 53 mph at 2 a.m.

The area is known as the Topkok blowhole where winds funnel from the mountains and hit a flat plain riddled with tundra lakes and sloughs. The temperature was in the single digits and the combined wind chill brought temperatures down to -20°F.

Right when the winds showed their fury, Jeff King and Aliy Zirkle were passing through the area.

That's when all changed.

King's GPS tracker stopped moving a short distance before Safety.

Apparently the winds had blown him into piles of driftwood that litter the trail in the area. As the ground storm kicked up what little bit of loose snow there was, visibility turned real bad.

According to a press release, King scratched about 3.7 miles outside of Safety. He told race officials that the wind was so severe that he had a hard time navigating the trail. King hunkered down for 2.5 hours with his dog team before asking a snow-machiner to help him by taking him to the Safety checkpoint to get in touch with race officials. King and his 11 dogs were moved to Safety for the night.

In the meantime, Zirkle fought through the wind and arrived in Safety at 10:57 p.m. stayed there for two hours and 38 minutes. At the finish line later she said she never saw King. "I got to Safety and he was missing. "I'd never been on the trail, I was lost," she told a reporter.

The winds she said seemed to be getting worse. "So I had a cup of coffee and what is a gal to do? When Dallas went through, I followed," she said.

That night, she said, was the hardest mushing she's ever done.

"It was life and death," she said. Dallas Seavey said at the finish line that the dog team, the sled and he were blown over the seawall onto the sea ice near Safety. For 100 yards, he said, he was at a 45-degree angle, with his hands on the ice for support to get his dog team untangled and back on to the trail over the breakwater that separates the sea from the Nome-Council Highway.

"I thought I was going to be blown to Russia," he said. He said the wind was horrible, he and his dog team were blown around in circles, but thanks to his leaders veteran Beatle and upcoming leader Reef, they kept on walking from trail marker to trail marker.

Seavey arrived in Safety at 1:13 a.m. and after only three minutes he continued on to Nome, not knowing that he was in the lead. A power outage at Safety Roadhouse didn't allow him a good look of who's around and who passed through.

"I just saw Aliy's name on the leader board," Seavey said in Nome.

He figured the checkers haven't updated the leader board and continued on. When he saw a headlamp and dog team behind him, he assumed that it was his father Mitch Seavey and wanted to give him a good run for third place.

It was Aliy Zirkle indeed, following Seavey out of the checkpoint on the last run to Nome.

In Nome, Seavey mushed to his second Iditarod championship title, received a $50,400 check and the keys to a brand new 4x4 truck.

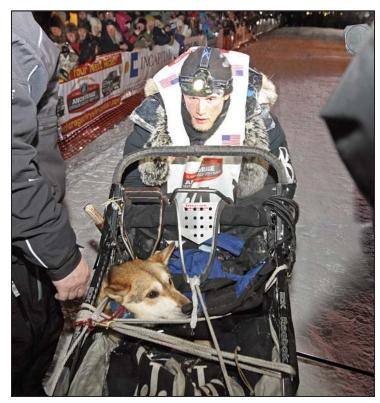

He credited his lead dog Beatle with his success, saying that he ran a conservative race, according to his schedule.

But when it came to navigating a dog team across glare ice, he said, the knowledge, wisdom and obedience of a proven lead dog such as Beatle comes into play.

"He was Johnny-on-the-spot when it counted," Seavey said.

"I just had the honor of driving the best dog team in the world," he said as he led his dog out of the chute

This marks Seavey's second victory of the Iditarod Sled Dog race.

EXHAUSTED— After sprinting to the finish line, Dallas Seavey sat down exhausted on his sled. He believed he had outrun his father Mitch Seavey for third place, when in fact he was winning the Iditarod race.

LAST CHECK POINT — Nome checker Leo Rasmussen makes it official. Dallas Seavey won the 2014 Iditarod in 8 days, 13 hours, 4 minutes, 19 seconds, when he arrived in Nome on Tuesday, March 11, 4:04 a.m.

2014 Iditarod wraps up in record time

By Diana Haecker

When the red lantern musher Marcelle Fressineau of Whitehorse, Canada drove her nine dogs into Nome and under the Burled Arch on Saturday, March 15 at 7:42 p.m., she officially ended the 2014 Iditarod race. She did so in the fastest time a Red Lantern musher ended the race in its 42-year history.

'Looking at the winning times of 20 days in the early years, this year's finishing times almost look like misprints," mused Iditarod Awards Banquet Emcee John Handeland as he introduced the finishing mushers.

First place winner Dallas Seavey broke the record set by John Baker in 2011 by more than 5 hours. Also arriving in record time were runner up Aliy Zirkle and third place winner Mitch Seavey.

Out of 69 mushers who started in Willow, Fressineau was the 49th dog driver to finish the Last Great Race. Twenty did not make it to Nome. Among those were mushing greats Jeff King, up-and-coming Big Lake prodigy Jake Berkowitz, former Quest champion Hugh Neff, top contenders Ramey Smyth and DeeDee Jonrowe, as well as veterans like Mike Santos, Linwood Fiedler, Karen Ramstead, Scott Janssen, Jim Lanier and Nicolas Petit.

Ten mushers scratched in Rohn, after getting beat up on a wild rollercoaster ride on icy trails down the most dangerous part of the trail. Berkowitz broke a sled beyond repair. Jonrowe said she was physically beat up and couldn't go on. Scott Janssen broke a leg and suffered hypothermia as he lay on the ice contemplating his options. Jim Lanier scratched because of an injured leg. Ramstead suffered a significant injury that prevented her from going on and taking care of the dogs. Linwood Fiedler sustained an injury in the Dalzell Gorge. Ellen Halverson scratched because of a damaged sled and in fear of what was yet to come "in an abundance of caution due to the experiences of teams ahead of me.'

Most mushers who continued were busy nursing their battle wounds all the way to Nome.

Mitch Seavey said he tore near every shoulder muscle and other muscles in his upper body and was not able to do much running to help

Nome musher Aaron Burmeister severely injured his leg past Rohn and is in need of surgery soon. Martin Buser badly sprained his ankle. Quest musher Hans Gatt sported a beat up face. Mushers offered open criticism at the finish line for the ITC to send mushers down a trail that was not only unsafe but also downright dangerous. A week prior to the race the committee contemplated moving the start to Fairbanks but decided to go forward with a Willow start. Trail blazers went out to build and improve trail conditions, but warm weather and rain just before the start turned the trail in the first portion into an icy nightmare.

However, 49 teams made it and did so in record time.

One tough race

Judging by the tales told as mushers arrived under the Burled Arch and during the Iditarod Awards Banquet on Sunday night, this race will go into the history books for its drama, its challenging trail conditions of glare ice, rocks, stumps, frozen dirt and lack of snow in the early part. But nothing prepared the mushers for the winds that awaited them on the coast and especially the

On that very same day, legislators in Juneau heard testimony from dog mushers advocating for protection of mushing, a beloved sport, lifestyle and iconic image of Alaska.

House Concurrent Resolution 24, sponsored by District 39 Representative Neal Foster, declares Alaska a "Right to Mush" state, recognizing the practice of dog mushing as part of the "past, present, and future culture of the state."

"When the mushing community brought the issue to me, it was a natural fit to sponsor the resolution," Foster said. "I was born and raised in Nome and have grown up around it. It's exciting and brings people together, brings life to the villages along the trail, and so many people are proud of and excited about it."

Since resolutions do not carry the legal weight of a bill, it is solely a formal statement of support for Alaska's mushers by the state legis-

Still, Foster said, "I'm very happy to see all the support for mushing.

The resolution has passed both Legislative bodies unanimously by Monday March 17.

Past, present and future

HCR 24 calls attention to the value of mushing as it weaves together the threads of culture, tradition and survival that have shaped Alaska. Mushing has been an invaluable part of Alaska Natives' way of survival in the Arctic for centuries. ### Letters -

Dear Editor:

We all love dogs in Nome — our own family pets and Iditarod dog teams. However, how smart is it to take your pet pooch to Front Street or out on the trail when the Iditarod dogs are finishing their very long

Tuesday afternoon I was several miles out of Nome at the road crossing awaiting the arrival of Martin Buser. There was a Nome person there with a beautiful German Shepherd. The dog was on a leash, but when Martin's dog approached the very icy road, the German Shepherd started barking and jumping (as dogs will do) which set Martin's dogs off course and Martin's sled into a very dangerous slide. His sled came within inches of hitting a parked truck. Because Martin is the great musher he is, he brought his dogs and sled under control and continued on his way. This scene could have been very sad if the sled had flipped ending Martin's run.

I was not polite in addressing the gentleman on his stupidity, and he responded, "My dog is tethered to My polite response is not printable. I really thought Nome residents had more savvy then what I saw at the finish of Iditarod 42. I want to express my sincere apologies to Martin Buser for any stress this act of stupidity caused him. On a whole, real Nomeites are very considerate and caring and don't take their family pets to the finish of the Last Great Race.

Dear Editor" "ECONOMIC GENOCIDE?"

A rose is still a rose, but unfortunately, a polecat will always remain a skunk! And when personal greed and limitless control flagrantly overrides equal treatment under the law, or our elected government attempts to obliterate the mandates that were "Our Magnificent initiated by Founding Fathers," then the meaning of equality has definitely lost something in the current translation of the word! "In other words, many politicians currently need a refresher course on who the true masters of this nation really are!"

Like many of you out there, our family fought gallantly in most of the wars that this nation of ours has engaged in over the past 238 years, all the way back to the American Revolution, and even before that in fact! As such, it appalls me when some arrogant cuss in politics attempts to rewrite the Constitution, and in particular The Bill of Rights!

After all is said and done, every right that you give up now, no matter how insignificant it may be in the eves of those who would attempt gain absolute control, is a right that you may never again regain, and a right that was paid for in the blood, sweat and tears of patriots that had forgotten more about what it truly

Foster's Report

By Rep. Neal Foster House District 39

Greetings to everyone in House District 39. We are in the second half of a two-year cycle, and that means legislators are anxious to see their bills get through before we adjourn on April 21. After that all bills must be reintroduced and go through the committee process next year.

In this report I will address three things: (1) Major issues; (2) Speeches by Governor Parnell, Chief Justice Fabe, and Senator Murkowski, and; (3) Bills that may be of interest to constituents. The last part of my report will be a permanent section that lists funding opportunities for both communities and individuals. The major issues have been the state deficit and a proposed constitutional amendment to fund private and religious schools.

State Deficit. As for the state deficit this is a product of both decreasing oil production, lower than forecast oil prices, and growing budgets. Oil taxes and royalties account for 93 percent of the State's income. In the mid-1980s the pipeline transported 2 million barrels per day. When I started working in the Legislature in 2010 that was down to 630,000 barrels per day. Last year that number stood at 530,000 barrels. It has been decreasing at a rate of about 6 percent per year. State spending, on the other hand, has been increasing at an unsustainable rate of 6 percent per year. The 2013 spring revenue forecast showed that the State might have a $667 million deficit. But when the forecast was updated in December 2013 oil prices fell to a point that we were now facing a $2 billion deficit. In contrast the State built up $17 billion in savings over a few short years just prior to 2013.

So what does a $2 billion revenue shortfall with no reversal in sight mean to Alaska? It means that capital and operating budgets will have to be cut. Two-years ago we saw perhaps the largest capital budget of $2 billion. Last

Editorial

Where is the Outrage?

There was a public testimony session for pending state legislation where public testimony was cut short. The irony is that it was a meeting about the need to hold public testimony. At times we may feel that our politicians operate in stealth mode and we must wear night vision goggles to see what they are up to. During this current Juneau legislative session the house tried fly below radar and get a bill passed that would not require public notices to be published in newspapers. It makes one believe that politicians would be very happy if they did not have to operate under the light of public scrutiny.

On the local level our city council chambers are not exactly overflowing with citizens wishing to observe democracy in action or to give testimony pro or con. One wonders if folks are afraid to speak up because they fear for repercussions. Well- no guts, no glory. We can't just shut up and live with it. It is not right to let the super rich sprinkle their outrageous ads because they think we are ignorant enough to believe them. How many of us have witnessed public meetings where the state or the feds won't spend a few bucks to let folks know they are coming to town? They spend a lot of public money getting themselves here and are so shocked when folks don't beat a path to their meeting because it was not publicized.

We need to grow a public backbone and demand that local and state officials support open government. We all need to care about government from the grass roots level to the very top. We can't be complaisant, or we will smother in half-truths and horse puckey.

A Look at the Past

Historical Comments by Laura Samuelson with photo courtesy of the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum BALTO OF NOME — Balto was the lead dog of the team run by Gunnar Kaasen which carried the diphtheria antitoxin into Nome in late January 1925. Balto was in the right place at the right time. He became the mascot of the Serum Run which actually involved 20 U.S. Mail Delivery dog teams from villages between Nenana and Nome. A bronze statue of Balto located in New York City's Central Park still stands today. It is "Dedicated to the indomitable spirit of the sled dogs that relayed the antitoxin ... to the relief of stricken Nome in the winter of 1925." "Endurance – Fidelity-Intelligence" Balto is the half-brother of Fritz.

FIRE — A fire at the Trigg residence on Fifth Avenue on Monday, March 17, was contained to a downstairs bedroom. Nome firefighters doused the flames inside and knocked out a window upstairs to ventilate the building. The cause of the fire is under investigation.

NVFD brings house fire under control

By Diana Haecker

The Nome Volunteer Fire Department, the Ambulance Department and Nome Police were called on Monday evening to respond to a house fire on Fifth Avenue in Nome. Smoke was billowing out of the windows of the green, two-story home, owned by John Trigg.

According to Nome Volunteer Fire Department Assistant Chief Jerry Steiger, the fire started in a downstairs bedroom and was contained to that room. Three people, who were in the house when the fire started, made it to the outside and called the NPD dispatch for help.

Steiger said NVFD responded with 20 to 25 firefighters and got the fire under control within an hour. The fire was confined to the bedroom but smoke filled the house. A fire fighter climbed up a ladder and smashed in an upstairs window to create more ventilation for the smoke to escape.

Steiger said the fire was not caused by an electrical malfunction or faulty house equipment. The NVFD is investigating the cause of the fire. Steiger also said that there was no working fire alarm in the house. He said it's the obligation of a house owner or landlord to have proper smoke detectors and fire alarms installed in a home. "If needed, get a hold of a fire fighter and we will install it for you," Steiger said. NVFD hasfire and smoke alarms available, but will not just hand them out to people.

According to Steiger, the three inhabitants of the home were transported to Norton Sound Regional hospital for a check up.

The house sustained damage in the room where the fire broke out. Steiger said it is not habitable at this moment, but the main structure did not suffer during the fire and only smoke damage needs to be taken care of before people move back in.

NJUS readies to vote up or down on Pilgrim geothermal

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System has come to a point where it needs to decide on going ahead with a contract to buy geothermal power from developers at Pilgrim Hot Springs.

NJUS must sign a contract with developers very soon to keep the money flowing for drilling and infrastructure

Without long-term revenue from power sales to amortize development and other costs, Pilgrim Limited would not move forward with development. The project needs to continue for Pilgrim Limited to hang on to investment tax credits available through the end of 2013. These are integral to the financial viability of a two-megawatt geothermal power development.

This week the NJUS Board of Directors met in work session with Antony Scott, economist from University of Alaska to study the dollars and cents issues in a proposed contract. Throughout Monday evening, certain truths became well evident. One of these is that no one can foresee price of diesel fuel during the next 20 years, but that predictable price for power is good. NJUS derives the lion's share of its electrical power from diesel generation.

A historical correlation between diesel and crude prices explains only half the variation in electrical costs, Scott said. One must figure the efficiency of generation and other local costs as billing, salaries, distribution and transmission. Scott said.

"I make oil price predictions for a living, and I am always wrong," Scott chuckled.

However, Scott believes that oil price projections suggest a reasonable chance that geothermal could provide a good deal considering diesel prices. If the ink went on the contract as it stood Monday, NJUS would agree to buy a geothermal power output of up to two megawatts at the flat price of 25 cents per kilowatt over the next 20 years. The cost of two megawatts would be nailed down and predictable for the duration of the contract as a hedge against the fluctuating price of diesel that would be required to generate them.

'Price predictability is worth quite a bit, whether diesel is higher or lower in anyone year," Scott said, "It is insurance against price shock.'

The diesel portion of kilowatt price currently costs NJUS 21¢. Geothermal power under the proposed contract would be locked in userready at only 4¢ more.

Nome's current cost of electrical power is based on subsidy from the Power Cost Equalization program. The PCE endowment could be very attractive for spending as money becomes tighter and tighter. PCE is not guaranteed, but depends on legislation, Scott observed, and the power of the rural caucus to preserve this money.

The two megawatts of power from Pilgrim Hot Springs would cost 24¢ without PCE. Geothermal power partially insulates local consumers against loss of PCE for part of the power supply.

"You are in control of your destiny," Scott said. "You are not subject to whims of someone in Juneau.'

No professional economists predict the price of diesel right out. More often, according to Scott, crude prices are predicted long into the future. From there comes an idea for diesel fuel prices and then one can take a stab at the price of diesel generated electrical power.

Diversifying the source of power over diesel, wind and geothermal would be a portfolio approach to supplying Nome's needs, Scott added.

Over the year, Nome's power demand is four megawatts-roughly six megawatts in winter and as low as two in the summer, according to John K. Handeland, utility manager. A megawatt equals 1,000 kilowatts. A kilowatt equals 1,000 watts, so a megawatt equals a million watts.

The utility could extend the contract with Pilgrim Limited for an additional 20 years, with the potential availability cheaper geothermal power down the road.

"The cost to the company is start up, not maintenance, according to Handeland. Howard Trott of Pilgrim Limited was to be in Nome to meet with the board at their regular meeting March 18 to answer further ques-

NJUS would take delivery of the geothermal power at a transformer at the terminus of NJUSS' transmission line at the Rock Creek Mine near Nome. NJUS would pay Pilgrim Geothermal 22¢ per kwh, and in addition, 4¢ would go to the owners of the hot springs, Unaatuq, LLC. For use of its connection at Rock Creek, NJUS would receive 1¢ per kwh. Pilgrim Limited would build and maintain the transmission line as well as the infrastructure at Pilgrim Hot

Wind generation has already been added to Nome's utility picture. An initial development by Banner Wind LLC has been in production for nearly five years. In 2013, NJUS added two 900 kwh generators using money from Alaska Energy Authority and Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. Next New Year's Day, NJUS will assume operational control and flexibility to reconfigure Banner Wind assets under a land use agreement.

Unaatuq, owners of the Pilgrim mission plot, comprises Native Village corporations of Sitnasuak, White Mountain, Teller, Mary's Igloo, Kawerak, Bering Strait Native Corp., and NSEDC.

Potelco, a construction company and investors in the geothermal development and production is a Washington corporation that is a subsidiary of Quanta Electrical Power Services of Houston, Texas.

University of Alaska's Alaska Center for Energy and Power coordinated a drilling program with financial support from Unaatuq and its partners, U.S. Dept. of Energy, ACEP, City of Nome ($300,000) Nome Chamber of Commerce and other contributors

Additional drilling remains to isolate the red-hot source of water, due to start soon, according to Gwen Holder, heading up the University of Alaska project.

Based on their belief that at least two megawatts of power production can be attained from the site, Potelco has contributed to the drilling program as well as conducted engineering development and design activities. They are willing to take the risk to build the 50mile high voltage transmission line from Pilgrim to Nome and develop the two-megawatt generation facility at the site, according to Hande-

Subject to entering an agreement to sell power to Nome in early 2014, additional drilling would start in April. The goal would be to have the power line constructed and the plant and other development ready to begin power production in Janu-

Nome police investigate death

According to Nome Police Chief John Papasodora, NPD was called for a welfare check at a residence on W. First Ave. Sunday, March 16. When officers arrived on scene, they found David Chung, 60, deceased. It appeared that the victim succumbed to a self-inflicted gunshot wound. Police said the body was sent to the medical examiner in Anchorage.

No foul play is suspected and next of kin have been notified.

AT THE END OF THE TRAIL—Iditarod and Yukon Quest veteran Hans Gatt drives his 11 dogs up the ramp and onto Front Street to finish in 9th position on March 11. Gatt was nine days, four hours and 40 minutes on the trail.

Right to Mush

Gold Rush, carrying freight, mail and even passengers to the furthermost reaches of the vast Alaskan wilderness.

Mushing's value has always been more than utilitarian, though, distinguished by the deep emotional connections between the people and the dogs they depended on for survival and companionship in a harsh and rugged landscape and unforgiving weather.

The movement to establish Alaska as a Right to Mush state has been championed by individuals and organizations around the state who share one common goal—the desire to preserve the accessibility of a time-honored, truly Alaskan activity for future generations without restriction.

Mike Williams Sr., a native Yup'ik and tribal leader who has run the Iditarod race 15 times and is renowned for his personal mission to promote sobriety and healthy living within his community, lives and raises sled dogs in Akiak with his son, who placed 11th in this year's race. Williams was pivotal in getting the Native community on board with the Right to Mush resolution last fall, a task he took on willingly.

"We face challenges more and more to our traditional ways of life," Williams Sr. explained. "This is what I've been doing all my life. There was never a time when I didn't have sled dogs. I explained to the Tribal Council in Akiak that this is about educating people to respect the mushing community and to respect our way of life. As Yup'ik people, we have lived with our dogs for thousands of years. There is a rich history. They are our family. The Council agreed we need to make sure mushing stays alive in Alaska without restrictions — they didn't even hesitate.'

Williams presented the proposed resolution to the Association of Village Councils in Bethel, where it passed unanimously by representatives of 56 villages.

In October, Williams presented the resolution proposal at the Alaska Federation of Natives' annual convention. "There was no opposition," he said. "It is a strong statement by the Native community of how important this way of life is. Without those dogs, our people couldn't have survived the elements."

A vanishing lifestyle?

With an event as monumental as the Iditarod, which focuses international attention on Alaska every year and draws in millions of tourism dollars to the state, it seems improbable that a piece of legislation to protect mushing would be necessary.

It's a problem that has arisen with the increasing growth and urbanization of Alaska. Due to the costs of raising and training sled dog teams, keeping the dogs close to home is the best and, in many cases, the only option for competitive mushers. "There are many mushers in the villages who have many dogs, but expenses don't allow village teams to compete in the big races," Williams observed. "There are expenses of food, transportation and travel costs, and in economically depressed communities many mushers have no corporate sponsors at all."

As the costs of shipping dog food, straw, and equipment to bush Alaska, as well as transportation costs to locations of the state's big races is prohibitively expensive for most village residents, fewer and fewer in the villages can afford to raise and maintain competitive dog teams even if they might wish.

Lance Mackey, four-time Iditarod champion commented, "The number one thing I hear when I'm in the villages is 'I can't afford to do this.' The Natives started it all, yet there are very few of them in it now."

Many of those who can afford to maintain kennels and participate are concentrated in the state's more populated communities. These areas also happen to attract residents who want to experience the solitude and wilderness of Alaska without giving up urban conveniences or the road system.

Inevitably, friction among neighbors occurs over the presence of dog kennels in developed areas and the use of trail systems for dog sleds.

Christine Roalofs, Iditarod finisher and winner of 2013 Red Lantern, owns and operates a kennel within Anchorage city limits and has worked diligently with her dogs to control barking and howling so that she can maintain her kennel while abiding by animal control ordinances. "We want to be in the city and we work hard to be good neighbors," Roalofs said.

Roalofs explained the fine balance mushers work with to help their dogs to develop acceptable and desirable behaviors. "I'm careful with my dogs. They are not allowed to routinely bark," she said, "but during harness hookups, you want them excited and enthusiastic. That's the wrong time to train barking out. Barking gets them excited and ready to run. And eating, that's also the right time for them to bark. If you let them get excited when it's mealtime, they learn to eat when they are presented with food. That's a big thing on the trail because you don't have routine mealtimes out there."

Roalofs pointed out that she was invited to become a member of the Anchorage's Animal Control Advisory Board to represent the interests of mushers in regard to operating kennels and using trails for dog sledding. "The number one complaint we hear is not about mushing, " she notes. "It's about the family pets that are chained up outside, bored, not given exercise or attention, who bark incessantly."

Out of conflicts over mushing, many of which have resulted in litigation, momentum for the movement to declare Alaska a Right to Mush state has quickly grown.

Organizations including kennel clubs and the Alaska Federation of Natives adopted their own resolutions that included stronger language than that which passed the Legislature this week.

The Willow Area Community Organization, Akiak Tribal Council, Association of Village Presidents, Pioneer Igloo #1, the Nome Kennel Club and Willow Dog Mushers Association each adopted similar Right to Mush resolutions, declaring a state of attack on mushing from within.

AFN's resolution in part reads: "Whereas sled dog mushers around the state are experiencing harassment through frivolous lawsuits, the hampering of kennel operations, sled dog training runs and obstruction of trails" and "Whereas mushers all over the state are being bullied, intentionally disturbed and bothered by individuals who have no respect for the art of dog mushing, dog husbandry, and the traditional Alaskan way of life."

ITC stays out of it

Interestingly, the Iditarod Trail Committee was presented with the resolution proposal last October, and declined to endorse it, citing some of the language as "confrontational" according to board meeting minutes.

However, ITC Executive Director Stan Hooley commented last week, "There needs to be some level of common sense protections for mushers in Alaska. The committee would want to take a look at the revised language to decide whether it's something they want to consider endorsing."

In an interview with the Nugget, Lance Mackey expressed frustration with the ITC's hesitancy to endorse the resolution.

"The ITC doesn't want to change, doesn't listen to the people. But they wouldn't exist if not for the mushers. It's time for them, and the State of Alaska to step up."

AFN's resolution also called for the creation of the Code of the North, which entails that "people who choose to live in Alaska should embrace the fact that sled dog mushing is still alive and practiced."

Leo Rasmussen, former mayor of Nome, has worked closely in various capacities with the Iditarod race since its beginning. "Alaska was a dog mushing area long before it ever became a territory, long before the U.S. purchased the land from Russians, long before it became a state," Rasmussen said. "People in Alaska need to learn to co-exist if we are going to preserve our history for the future of great events that have been taking place for a long time.

The Iditarod is a stupendous event — there's no more challenging event in the world, and it represents our historic way of life. It isn't going to happen if people in bush Alaska can't live with their dogs — it's the only way they can afford to raise them."

Among most mushers, the Code of the North is a given when it comes to perceptions of Alaska.

Mackey remarked, "I'm almost laughing this is even an issue. This is the state sport. This is what we are in Alaska. If you move to the state of Alaska, you know the road system is minimal, and you know what you're getting into with trails and dogs in subdivisions." Ray Redington Junior, grandson of the founder of the Iditarod race and fresh off the trail, mused, "It's funny to have people complaining about dogs when dogs have made this state what it is. I think if you own your property, you ought to be able to do what you want, especially the things you enjoy doing.'

Step in right direction

HCR 24, which focuses on the importance of mushing for the historical identity, cultural image and economic significance the sport brings to the state, omits language about the attack on mushing and Code of the North. The state's resolution focuses on mushing as a positive means to promote physical and spiritual health, and as an expression of Alaskan cultural identity.

Representative Foster pointed out that declaring anything as a "Right to" often generates attention and sometimes, opposition, even on an issue that would seemingly be undis-

However, the consensus among representatives was overwhelmingly supportive of the resolution. Some mushers, while in support of the resolution, would still prefer to see more specific and firmer laws protecting mushing.

Mitch Seavey, 2013 Iditarod champion and one member of a famous Alaskan mushing family dynasty, has been through his share of litigation challenging his own kennel operations. "Of course as a musher, I support the Right to Mush, but what really needs to happen are laws with teeth," Seavey said. "I hope that in addition to this resolution, there would be laws in the state of Alaska in favor of mushing. It's just so important to the state.'

Mike Williams Sr. still describes it as a step in the right direction, however. "I describe the legislative process as the sausage mill," he said. "When we have the intention to put strong language in, it gets watered down. It's just part of the political process. But the statement is still there. Now we can have an ongoing debate on the issue, and in the end, hopefully people will be in a position where they will support it."

Rep. Foster sees it as a positive step for the sport as well. "Now the dialogue is open. We can reference this resolution, that all Representatives supported, if we need to build on this legislation later."

Mushing's significance to Alaska is certainly evident in economic terms. The ceremonial start of the Iditarod in Anchorage garners worldwide media attention, as does the Iditarod's website, and this year, the race will once again be featured on national television, with coverage by the Sportsman Channel. All of this attention helps draw thousands of Iditarod fans to the state to witness mushers and their dog teams participate in the Last Great Race.

Foster remarked, "What I think makes mushing great, is that it never loses its magic. The Iditarod comes and goes every year, but it never gets old. The excitement and pride is still there." The race generates muchneeded winter tourism dollars for the communities of Anchorage and Wasilla, and provides an invaluable boost to the economies of Nome and other communities along the trail. After the devastating spring flood that hit the Yukon community of Galena last year, race marshal Mark Nordman inquired if the town could tolerate the Iditarod coming through again this year. Their response was that they need the Iditarod to come through, to provide some much needed positive activity.

HCR 24 acknowledges the contributions mushing makes, stating, "Dog mushing attracts millions of fans and tourists from around the world, and contributes to the economies of the state and communities in the state.

ITC's Stan Hooley describes mushing as "one of the most unique things about Alaska. Thousands of people travel here to witness this great event?

"Certainly if it's that intriguing to them, we as Alaskans ought to be interested in protecting and taking care of it," he said. Hooley believes that the experience of mushing best captures its appeal. "It's hard to believe if anyone takes the time to visit a kennel or gets the opportunity to stand on sled runners and experience the sport, they would feel that it needs to be pushed off into a corner somewhere.

Standing on a sled behind a team of dogs heightens one's sense to experience the spectacular beauty of Alaska in a way that is unmatched. "It's a magical, wonderful activity. I'm an avid snowmachiner, but I don't have a bond with my snowmachine," he smiled.

Those who live the life of a musher can attest to the value of the sport beyond the positive economic impact to the state. Training and caring for the dogs requires physical conditioning, fitness, and time, eliminating the tendency toward lesshealthy ways of beating boredom. Williams explained, "It's a positive activity for the communities and it sure does beat the cabin fever.' Williams, who used mushing as a platform to campaign for sobriety within Native communities, also spoke to the capacity of dogs to literally save lives. "In the diphtheria epidemic, dogs brought the serum to the people and saved them from the disease. I'm seeing needless deaths in my community to alcoholism and suicide. So I'm advocating for mental, physical, and spiritual wellness but I let the dogs do the job."

Raising dog teams is truly a lifestyle for mushers, one they choose to pursue, even with its hardships and sacrifices, out of love for their dogs. "Ask any musher — no one would say their dogs are anything less than family," commented Rasmussen.

"There are sacrifices I have to make because I choose to raise dogs," Roalofs explained. "I might like to go out and spend time with my friends after work, but I have dogs depending on me to come home and take care of them. And it's something I want to do because I love them.'

Mitch Seavey laughed as he recalled the sketchy conditions around the "blow hole", that section of the Iditarod trail between White Mountain and Safety, where mushers traveled through out-of-this-world winds and contended with glare ice, drifts, poor visibility and extreme temperatures. "I have tremendous respect for the dogs," said Seavey. "I really had to rely on them to do the right thing most of the time, there were times when I had no ability to use my brakes or snow hooks. That's the neatest thing this race brought out in the dogs. It was a different kind of relationship, one of mutual trust instead of me calling the shots all the time. And it was tough on the mushers but the dogs had a lot of fun. I'm getting beat to death on the trail but I check in with the dogs and their tails are wagging, they're ready to go, and then I'm laughing. We feed off each other."

That relationship and shared experience between the musher and the dogs is the core of what the sport is about, and what mushers hope to preserve by making Alaska a Right to Mush state. "Mushing is still alive in the villages, and as long as I'm alive, I will never let it die," declared Mike Williams Sr. "We do it because we love our dogs," explained Mackey

"It's the first time I've ever been glad to see it over," Redington about this year's Iditarod, but he softened as he spoke about his team.

"The sled dogs, their personalities, their desire to run, the enthusiasm of it... someone living in an apartment building with a pet doesn't get to experience that.

Knowing what sled dogs are capable of, they're the best creature God's ever made. Nothing comlast stretch between Topkok, Safety and Nome.

It seemed that the country took some mushers by their words when they declared at the beginning of the race "Bring it on."

The Norton Sound coast took a deep breath and exhaled even longer and deeper, blowing mushers and their teams like rag dolls about.

Dramatic finish

As Nomeites anticipated the arrival of the race's winner, it seemed clear that it was going to be Jeff King. Leaving White Mountain with 11 dogs, posting fast run times and having a lead of an hour over Aliy Zirkle, it seemed like a done deal. However, after descending Topkok Hill and hitting the beach trail, it became clear that winds had picked up dramatically. According to an Iditarod Insider interview with Jeff King the winds blew King's dog team off the trail. "The wind would catch my sled, I would roll and take the whole team sideways with me,' King says in the interview. "I was like a rock around their neck."

As the wind gusts got too intense, the dogs couldn't stay on their feet. Two dogs in particular pulled at his heartstrings, King said. King wrestled his sleeping bag out of the sled and put these two dogs in there, spooning with them for a while. Then, the whole dog team shared the sleeping bag and huddled together. Staying out there was not a feasible option, so when a group of snowmachiners approached, King asked for a ride to Safety. There he saw Aliy Zirkle, who gave him a huge hug, relieved to see him.

Zirkle said at the musher's banquet that on a normal day, she would not sit down and have coffee with King, but in that moment she felt relieved to see him alive.

King only said, "My dogs aren't here."

Race marshal Mark Nordman then saw to it that King got his dogs off the icy trail and into Safety with the help of the Iditiarod Insider crew. That was the end of King's race. "Until you have experienced the chill and the wind and the darkness and the feeling of approaching incapacity, then you have the full ability to make your own opinion," King

While the wind denied King passage, Zirkle and later Dallas Seavey somehow made it through.

Zirkle made it to Safety without ever seeing King and his huddled team. And a couple of hours later, Dallas Seavey had fought his way to Safety, pushing on to Nome, totally oblivious that he took the lead.

But all who lived through that stormy night on the trail said that the race became irrelevant and that it was only about survival.

Prior to leaving White Mountain, Zirkle gave herself a 25 percent chance to catch King and she said she had a great race up to that point. "The winds that my dog team endured were phenomenal. Many times I thought we would get blown into the open ocean, which was not a good option. I always knew that we were going to make it, but I was this close to not making it to Safety,"

Zirkle said

While there at the checkpoint, Zirkle had a cup of coffee. "I was tired, I was mentally exhausted," she said. When Dallas Seavey pulled into the checkpoint, Zirkle went outside, looked over his team and decided that it was time to go. "The last 22 miles of my race were fun," she said. "I did my darnest to catch that young man."

Zirkle almost did. For the third time, she narrowly lost her first Iditarod Championship to a Seavey: in 2012 to Dallas, in 2013 to his father Mitch and again in 2014 to Dallas. But it didn't matter, she said. "I have no regrets. It was a fantastic race and congrats, Dallas," she said to roaring applause at the Rec Center during the finisher's banquet.

Dallas Seavey in an interview with The Nome Nugget remembers the last 20 miles as an attempt to make it to Nome alive. He said for a short time he had contemplated staying in Safety for a bit, but then decided to push on and get his dogs to the finish line where they would be out of harm's way and could rest. Asked if he really had no idea that he was about to win the race, Seavey said, no, he didn't. This final night of a taxing Iditarod race was very confusing to begin with. In Seavey's mind. King had a commanding lead. the wind battle left him exhausted, he only saw Aliy Zirkle's name at the clipboard at Safety, but thought Jeff King went past before checkers arrived. Thinking that the leaders are out of reach and that his father Mitch Seavey is no less than two hours behind him, Dallas Seavey thought he could coast to Nome and not be in a hurry. But wrong. Not knowing that Zirkle left Safety at his heels, Seavey assumed that his father caught up with him when he saw a distinctive move of a musher's headlamp bobbing up and down behind him on the trail. Seavey began pumping, running and pedaling up Cape Nome, down Cape Nome and the last 13 miles into town. There he collapsed onto his sled. When he mustered some strength again, he crawled to his wheel dog Glitter and there learned from a cameraman that he just won the 2014 Iditarod. "Where are Aliy and Jeff? Where's my dad?" Seavey asked confused.

Then, things made sense: The crowds on Front Street, the glaring lights, the roaring welcome. "I was the first person to make it across the finish line and the last person to realize it," Seavey said at the banquet.

Zirkle came in two minutes after the 26-year old Seavey. She looked shell-shocked and plain relieved to be at the finish line. She classified the mushing she just did as the hardest she's ever done and said it was a matter of life or death.

In hindsight, Seavey muses that having only seven dogs left in his team during the storm ordeal may have been the pivotal part of being able to make it through. The lesser amount of dogs on the gang line meant that as the dogs were spun around and got hung up on driftwood, it took less time to untangle them each time and keep going.

At the finisher's banquet he said that unlike wrestling, mushing is not a sport against somebody or something, but something a person does with his or her dogs against the trail, the weather and circumstances. "We are hearing a lot of stories about mushers putting the race behind and helping each other," Seavey said. And that's the spirit of this race and mushing in general.

Camaraderie

The Iditarod Official Finishers Club voted that Michael Williams Jr. receive the Sportsmanship award. IOFC president Aaron Burmeister said, "It seems that wherever help was needed, there he was. I know that he helped me when I needed help the most."

Williams Jr. of Akiak, came upon Burmeister as he had just suffered a horrendous wipeout. About 18 miles outside of Rohn, Burmeister hit a stump, which sheared off his drag, pinned his leg under the brake and basically ripped the knee out of its socket. "I blacked out, it was so painful," said Burmeister. He recovered best as he could and moved on to where he came upon Sonny Lindner, Aliy Zirkle and Nick Petit camping. Lindner gave him some vet wrap. Burmeister kept on moving and finally stopped near Farewell Lake, where Mike Williams Jr. found him in excruciating pain.

Burmeister asked Mike Williams for help to pop the dislocated knee back into place, to which the pale Akiak musher responded, " I think I'm going to throw up." But he didn't and assisted Burmeister in the painful task to align the Nome musher's leg again and wrap it up with vet wrap. Burmeister still had 55 miles of icy, side-hilling, challenging trail to go. "There was no way I was going to quit," Burmeister said. His dogs got him to Nikolai and there, a nurse from McGrath fitted him with a knee brace and a lot of painkillers.

Burmeister said once he knew that only the ligaments were broken and that the damage was done and couldn't get any worse, there was no doubt in his mind to give up. However, checkpoint routines that usually take him 45 minutes now took him two hours because he kept slipping and falling because the knee gave out. This cut into the meager sleep schedule Iditarod front-runners allocate themselves and he grew more and more tired.

Reaching Golovin Bay, Burmeister encounter beautiful conditions. But that was about to change in a hurry and suddenly he found himself on the glare ice with north winds blowing him backwards. Burmeister opted to veer off to the eastern shoreline and take a detour since walking on the ice was not feasible. Seeking a local trail leaving Golovin also led him on a detour, but he made it to White Mountain safely with eight dogs, arriving there sweaty from walking and crashing and chilly from the cold wind finding its through the heavy winter gear. In White Mountain, the mushers were advised about the crazy out-of-this-world winds that blew through the blowhole. Burmeister, Ray Redington, Jessie Royer and Hans Gatt opted to stay longer than their mandatory eight hours to ease their passage. After an extra eight hours rest, Burmeister drove his 7dog team into Nome in 10th place. "I have never ran a race that was so tough for so long," he said.

Burmeister, for not giving up when suffering an excruciating knee injury, received the Musher's Choice award, which honors the most inspirational musher.

One of the more memorable images that brought home how severely challenging the 2014 Iditarod trail was, was the image of 31-time Iditarod finisher Martin Buser down on his knees at the finish line.

He just knelt there for a while, with his face buried in his hands.

Buser had also spent the entire course pretty much in pain. A dislocated pinky on his left hand was at first only a little inconvenience, Buser said. But it got progressively worse and painful until it turned into excruciating pain all the time. He managed to navigate what race officials called "technical" but meant ice, rocks and stumps littered trails north of the Alaska Range. Buser lost his drag, a mat that is used to slow down dog teams without using the pointy brake, about 9 miles out of Rohn. That coincided with trail conditions getting worse, Buser said. His dogs raced up and down those hills, over ice and dirt, stumps and sticks. "And than whack, whack my leg went under the sled and the brake bar and from then on, it was a struggle," Buser said. He said the trail was so challenging that he made his concerns known how rookies and lessexperienced mushers would be able to master the trail without sustaining severe injuries.

Buser badly sprained his ankle and - like Burmeister - had to depend on his dogs to pull him all the way to the finish line, when they would usually help running up hills or pedaling or ski-poling at least. Despite gimping along on a bad left ankle and having a hurting left hand with the buddy-taped pinky, Buser managed to finish in sixth place and was awarded the Leonard Seppala Humanitarian Award. He said he had received this coveted award for the fifth time.

Hans Gatt, who came out of semiretirement, reached the Burled Arch and said this race confirmed that he'll now commit to fully retiring from 1,000-mile sled dog racing. Travis Beals spoke to a low point when he sat on his sled, not knowing how to gather the strength to go on when Allen Moore came by and asked him "What's the matter, boy?"

Beals said he was bummed out and had doubts do go on, to which Moore answered, "Put on your big boy pants and get zesty!" Beals did and wondered the whole way up to Nome what Moore meant by "get-

Jason Mackey, greeted by his mother Kathy in Nome, also said that if he would've known how "challenging" the trail was, he doubted that he would've been participating. His brother Lance Mackey, four-time Iditarod champion, sat this Iditarod out for health reasons.

Near-death experiences

Hugh Neff did not hold back when telling his story of nearly freezing to death as he sat on the sea ice at Golovin Bay. Neff was also caught in the windstorm, just as he tried to cross Golovin Bay enroute to White Mountain. "I was stuck in a no-win situation," said Neff in Nome. "I had no footing myself, and me and my team were blown over backwards. Neff said he had only seven dogs left and couldn't power against those strong winds, so he hunkered down right there on the sea ice, chopped a hole in the ice and set his hook. "It was a long night in a tiny sled bag, shivering away and all I kept on saying to myself, 'I want to live, I want

Neff said he kept on pushing the emergency button on the SPOT device mushers carried with them this year. "I was only nine miles from White Mountain but it took them over 10 hours to come." When Dave Branholm showed up on his snowmachine, Neff said it was about time. "For some reason they were thinking I was taking a rest break or something, but when you're out on the sea ice, you're not starting a campfire and hanging out, resting your dogs – you're surviving. I barely survived," Neff said. "It was brutal, it was Mother Nature at its finest.

Neff kept feeding himself jellybeans to stay awake and not fall asleep. "My legs and my lower arms were starting to freeze up, I could literally feel my body freezing," Neff said. "I could feel myself dying. So when the guy finally came and looked at me, I said 'What took you so long?' I've been pressing the emergency button the whole night, maybe I was doing it wrong, not holding the button down long enough.

By accepting outside help to get himself and the dog team to White Mountain, Neff was forced to scratch. Although he doesn't know if there will be more Iditarods in his future, he said him and his new best friend Dave Branholm will be penning a book called "Surviving the mushing madness - The Last Great Race 2014"."

The emotional strain of a 1,000mile long dog race cannot be understood by those of us who have not done it. But 49 people know what it feels like to have survived what most Iditarod veterans called the most challenging trail ever. Some even smiles on the back of the pack rookies Monica Zappa, Lisbet Norris and Marcelle Fressineau showed.

When Aliy Zirkle gave her speech at the banquet, she talked about a very quiet young woman who approached her in Unalakleet to have her photo taken with Zirkle. "She said, 'My boyfriend thinks that women are sissies. I'm going to show this picture to him when you win'," Zirkle said, ending her speech asking all 13 female Iditarod 2014 finishers to stand up. "Do you think we're sissies?" Zirkle asked the crowd. "I don't think we're sissies." To roaring applause she left the stage.

Mitch Seavey, third place finisher, could at least find humor in the fact that his kid beat him and also a woman. But he said he'll be back to change that. "I just can't get used to losing to women and children," he

Iditarod showcases Nome and regional artists

Artists from Nome and surrounding Norton Sound Villages competed in the 15th Annual Iditarod Fine Art Show sponsored by the Nome Arts Council. The show was held at Old St. Joseph Hall March 10 - 15. This year's judges were Jeanne Seward of Eugene, OR, Kathy Chapoton of Big Lake, AK, Nina Grimes of Nome and Jeff Rigo of Fairbanks. They all have a love for art and were excited to be a part of this year's event.

A reception was held Friday afternoon and the public enjoyed refreshments while admiring the artwork and visiting with the artists. Event organizer, Angela Hansen extended a welcome and thanked those who participated in and helped with the show, especially the Nome Arts Council for their continuous encouragement and financial support.

Special thanks went to Delores Orman for receiving entries and helping throughout the week, Todd Hindman who set up the picture racks, Jeanne Seward and Lisa Leeper for hanging the art and Tricia Walters for advertising the event. Great appreciation was also expressed to Nora Nagaruk for typing the artist information cards and to Cheryl Thompson and Karen Olanna for making the art and craft show possible in Old St. Joe's.

In memory of Nome artist, Patrice Shook a new award was developed by fellow artist, Karen Olanna. It was awarded to the best animal art in both the Adult and Youth Divisions.

Josie Stiles, President of the Nome Arts Council, addressed the crowd and announced the winners as they came forward to accept their prize money and ribbons.

"Nome-Coming" by Angela Orman Hansen

The votes for the People's Choice Award were tallied and this year's winner is "Nome-Coming," a watercolor painting of Iditarod musher, Martin Buser, racing up the chute toward the burled Iditarod Arch by Angela Orman Hansen.

The three raffled pieces of artwork this year were: "Pilgrim River, September" print by Claudia Ihl, "Whiskered Auklet" original woodblock print by Patrice Shook and "Nome-Coming" print by Angela Orman Hansen. The happy winners were Michelle Bonham of Nome, Wiletta Stehlik of Palmer, AK and Cory Hilby of Olympia, WA.

To end the program, Hansen said it was another excellent showing of local artwork and encouraged people to begin their showpieces for next year's 16th Annual Iditarod Fine Art

Alaska's GOP Governor Sean Parnell Sues Kochs Over Closed North Pole Refinery, Sullivan Remains Silent

Kochs Fired 80 Alaska Workers, Now Attempting To Stick Taxpayers With Future Cleanup Costs

Since August, Koch-Funded AFP Has Spent $30 Million On Political Attack Ads, Including More Than $640,000 In Alaska To Prop Up Dan Sullivan

While spending millions every month to buy themselves a U.S. Senate that is good for them but bad for almost every other American family, the Koch brothers closed an Alaska refinery, citing "excessive costs," and fired 80 Alaskan workers in the process. Now the Kochs are attempting to escape liability for future cleanup costs of groundwater contamination that the refinery is responsible for.

In a new development, Alaska's Republican Governor Sean Parnell is suing the Koch subsidiary in order to hold them accountable for cleanup costs. The lawsuit charges that Koch subsidiary Flint Hills failed to properly clean up the spill and spread of chemicals into the area's groundwater and alleges that they should foot more of the bill for the cleanup. Earlier this week in a Tuesday interview with KFAR, Mark Begich threw his support behind Parnell's lawsuit.

Unlike Mark Begich and Republican Governor Parnell, Dan Sullivan has refused to criticize or hold the billionaire Kochs accountable, because he wants to go to Washington to push their reckless and irresponsible agenda that includes ending Social Security and Medicare as we know it, eliminating student loans, stopping the renewal of unemployment benefits, fighting against raising the minimum wage, and pushing our country to the brink of default in order to pay for bigger tax breaks for the wealthy and big corporations.

"In a show of bipartisanship Mark Begich has announced his support for Republican Governor Sean Parnell's lawsuit against the Koch company because that's what's best for Alaska, but Dan Sullivan still refuses to criticize the Koch brothers' actions, proving that he doesn't care about the Alaskans the Kochs fired or the families they hurt," said Justin Barasky, a spokesman at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. "By staying silent while the Kochs attempt to escape all liability, Dan Sullivan is making it clear that if elected to the Senate he will be a vote for the Kochs' reckless and irresponsible agenda, not for Alaska families.'

Koch brothers ads in Alaska have been roundly criticized by independfact checkers like FactCheck.org who called a recent attack "not true" and Politifact who deemed the Koch brothers' latest Alaska carbon tax ad "false," and last year the Kochs' credibility took a major hit when the New York Times reported that Americans for Prosperity was caught using a Maryland actress to claim that Mark Begich had lost touch with Alaska.

The DSCC's GOP is "Addicted to Koch" campaign holds Republican Senate candidates accountable for the millions of dollars in help they are receiving from the Kochs in exchange for their support of a reckless and irresponsible agenda that hurts America's middle class.

Democrats move pro-job, public education and cost-saving budget amendments

Amendments to provide opportunities and save money long into the fu-

March 14 Alaska House Democratic legislators offered a series of amendments to the state operating budget to improve public education, promote workforce development, and trim wasteful spending.

"Our focus is always on jobs and education," said House Democratic Leader Chris Tuck (D-Anchorage). "These amendments target proven, cost-effective ways to improve public education at all levels and to help Alaskans get good jobs.'

"Making these investments now can provide opportunities and save the state money long into the future," said House Democratic Whip Max Gruenberg (D-Anchorage).

The caucus' first amendment would have added $101 million for school districts to offset recent budget cuts and reverse statewide cuts to teachers and other staff.

"We would rather have public education funding in the base student allocation so schools can count on it year after year, but until that happens, we need to try to get it into the budget any way we can," said Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage). "It's time to reverse the teacher and staff cuts, and stop next year's. Cutting over 600 educators since 2011 has been bad enough."

The next amendment would have added $2 million to support the successful voluntary public preschool program which began as a pilot program five years ago and has families and school districts lined up to participate.

"The results are in, and pre-K works," said Representative Andy Josephson (D-Anchorage). "If we want to improve student performance, preschool is the proven answer.

The third amendment the caucus introduced would have restored the appropriation for the Alaska Youth First program in the Department of Labor to what the governor had originally requested before the House Finance Committee cut it. The program administers career readiness counselors in and out of schools to help young Alaskans get good jobs and prepare for better ones.

The Alaska Youth First program helps young Alaskans, both inside the school system and outside it, to match their skills and goals with the jobs that are right for them," said Representative Sam Kito III (D-Juneau). "Having the right career advice and support can make all the difference in getting on a positive career track for young people struggling to enter the workforce.'

The caucus' fourth amendment would have restored money requested by the University of Alaska to continue popular courses and prevent tuition increases or keep them at a minimum. That money was cut in the governor's budget.

'The University is an economic driver and offers high performance programs with proven track records for training Alaskans to get jobs as nurses, engineers and other high demand jobs," said Representative David Guttenberg (D-Fairbanks). "We need to grow the University, not cut it, if we want to prepare the next generations to take the reins of tomorrow from us.'

In addition to the above amendments, the caucus ran amendments to increase caregiver support and to restore additional money proposed by the governor for behavioral health grants.

Members of the caucus also ran two amendments to cut wasteful spending from the budget including amendments to reduce funding for the Alaska Aerospace Corporation and to remove salary increases for executives of the recently-created Alaska Gasline Development Corporation who are already making over $175,000 a year.

Governor's Education Bill Passes Committee

Alaska's Education Opportunity Act Moves to House Finance

Governor Sean Parnell March 13 applauded the House Education Committee for passing his comprehensive education bill, HB 278, Alaska's Education Opportunity Act - legislation that will strengthen Alaska's public education system.

"I applaud the House Education Committee for thoroughly reviewing our legislation and passing it out of committee," Governor Parnell said. "I remain committed to signing legislation that grows charter school opportunities, improves career and vocational programs, and provides more funding for our students. Although the committee removed the SAT and ACT element of our bill, I recognize that this is only the beginning in a long process.'

The governor also thanked the committee for adopting his amendment that supports the Alaska Native Science and Engineering Program and other programs throughout the state. This tax credit for nonprofit scholarships awarded to dual credit students now captures all costs associated with in-state dual credit programs, including tuition, registration, on-campus room and board, and transportation costs.

House Democrats comment on withdrawal of Governor's controversial appointee

March 13 Representative Scott Kawasaki (D-Fairbanks), Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) and Representative Andy Josephson (D-Anchorage) released the following statements upon hearing Dennis Mandell had withdrawn his name from consideration for the Alaska Assessment Review Board after concerns were raised about his residency, his history of working for the oil industry in disputes against Alaska, and his failure to pay taxes.

"At least Mr. Mandell had the integrity to do the right thing when the governor would not," said Kawasaki. This governor tried to stack the deck against everyday taxpayers in Fairbanks with another big oil appointment who isn't even from Alaska. It continues a troubling trend that the governor who also pushed us off a fiscal cliff with SB21 continues to work against Alaskans in favor of the big oil corporations.'

"The governor keeps bending over backwards to give the oil industry control over the taxes they pay to Alaskans," said Gara. "Firing a fair tax assessor and trying to break the law to let oil company executives control how little Alaskans receive for their oil-related property taxes is yet another giveaway. Mr. Mandell made the right decision."

"I am pleased with the announcement of Mandell's withdrawal. His California residency was not the only concern here. The governor needs nominees who represent Alaskans, not corporate interests," said Joseph-

House says consider economic impacts of injunctions Feige's HB47 levels the playing field

in state court proceedings on proj-

Wednesday, March 12 the Alaska House of Representatives today passed Rep. Eric Feige's bill to highlight that the courts should follow their own rule in making filers post bonds when requesting the courts to stop legally permitted industrial operations.

House Bill 47 levels the playing field when injunctions or stays are considered by state judges. "The bill puts filers on notice," Feige, R-Chickaloon, and the Co-Chair of the House Resources Committee, said. "Those who file suits should have financial consequences to contend with. Ultimately, as the law is written today, those who feel the most immediate impacts of these cases are workers and their families and that's not right, because workers are laid off and the economic activity and benefits grind to a halt."

Under current state law, the cost to bring a lawsuit against a legally permitted project is almost zero, as the hisk is borne by the defendants. junctions cause delays to projects, shutting them down completely in most cases, at a significant cost to working Alaskans, businesses and the state treasury.

"We're not limiting public access or involvement," Feige said. "We're protecting our respected process and looking to strengthen our economy and provide a fair level of protection to those pursuing projects.

"The State already has a rigorous, deliberate, science-based permitting system with many opportunities for public participation, and we trust their process," Feige said. "We also trust the courts to uphold the laws we pass. This bill brings fairness and equity to the process and will make those who look to stall or kill worthwhile, legally-permitted projects, think twice and pony up in order to make their case.

HB 47 parallels the bar set out in Alaska Ĉivil Rule 65(c), which states: "no restraining order or preliminary injunction shall issue except upon the giving of security by the applicant, in such sum as the court deems proper, for the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who is found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained." (Emphasis added)

Judges already have the ability to require security. In most cases they are not doing so. This bill works with the existing civil rule and requires that the party requesting the court to ask for a bond or security present evidence of the costs and damages incurred and that the court consider this as one of the relevant factors when it determines a bond/security amount; setting the amount of the bond remains with the courts.

The bill was clarified to make it clear that no such security is required of the state or a municipality. Exception language was also added to avoid any unintended consequences with federal programs that the state has assumed primacy for, specifically Clean Air, Clean Water and Surface Coal.

HB 47 now moves to the Alaska Senate for consideration.

Senate Finance Committee moves Corrections Reform Bill Bill reduces recidivism, cuts costs, and maintains public safety

The Senate Finance Committee moved Senate Bill 64 out of committee, a criminal justice and corrections reform omnibus bill sponsored by the Senate Judiciary Committee with the help of Senators Ellis, French, and Dyson, and carried by Senator John Coghill (R-North

"It's encouraging to see progress being made," said Senator Coghill. "If we don't do something, we'll need to begin planning a new prison in just two years."

The current version of SB 64 creates several proven programs to address Alaska's high recidivism rate. The bill establishes innovative methods of doing probation, including a 24/7 Sobriety program, raises the felony theft threshold, expands assessments of inmates, and creates a recidivism reduction fund to finance re-entry programs.

Judiciary Committee passes Senator Meyer's 'Spice' Bill

Senate Bill 173 would make misleading packaging illegal and establish fines of $500 per package

The Senate Judiciary Committee passed Senate Bill 173, sponsored by Senator Kevin Meyer (R-Anchorage), which aims to stop the sale of illicit synthetic drugs by banning misleading statements on packaging. Currently, the synthetic drugs, which are commonly used as alternatives to marijuana and cocaine, are being sold legally in stores statewide as potpourri, bath salts, plant food, and even iPod cleaner.

If passed, the new law would require 'Spice' packaging to include labels which specifically say what is contained in the packets, the intended use, and the name of the manufacturer. The packaging cannot be "false or misleading" and must carry accurate directions for use. The penalty for possession is $500 per packet.

"This is a rabbit I have been chasing for many years. Despite our best efforts to outlaw the most common chemicals, manufacturers changed the compounds slightly to make them legal," said Senator Meyer. "That's why we needed to take a new approach and focus on stopping the sale of these dangerous drugs based on their misleading packaging.

The idea for Senate Bill 173 comes from an ordinance passed by the Anchorage Assembly earlier this

"The effects of these drugs are so incredibly dangerous— this law needs to be in effect statewide. A lot of kids think Spice and other synthetic drugs are a cheap way to get a buzz or a high, and even worse, they think it is safe because it is legally sold," said Senator Meyer. "In Anchorage, the ordinance had an immediate effect and is a tremendous success so far with most stores pulling the dangerous drugs from the shelves. By making this a civil matter rather than a criminal penalty, it

Mixed Bean Musk Ox Chili

Recipe by Miller Health Consulting, LLC

Makes Approximately (7) 1 cup servings Preparation and Cook Time: 30 minutes Difficulty Level: Medium

Ingredients:

Olive oil cooking spray

l pound ground musk ox 3 Tbsp. chili powder (divided)

- 1 tsp. garlic (divided) ½ tsp. crushed red pepper
- l diced yellow onion
- 2 cups presoaked mixed beans
- 1 (15oz.) can diced tomatoes
- 1 (15oz.) can tomato sauce ½ tsp. basil

Shredded mozzarella cheese (optional)

Directions:

- 1. Spray hot skillet with cooking spray. Add the diced yellow onion and brown on medium-high heat. Add ground musk ox to skillet on medium heat. Mix in 1 Tbsp. chili powder,  $\frac{1}{2}$  tsp. garlic, and the crushed red pepper. Continue cooking until meat is brown. Set aside.
- Combine musk ox, mixed beans, diced tomatoes, tomato sauce, the remaining chili powder and garlic in stockpot with the basil. Bring contents to a boil then reduce to low heat and cook for 20 minutes

3. To serve, place 1 cup in bowl and sprinkle with mozzarella cheese if desired. Savor and enjoy.

Tips:

- * Use dried beans for a less expensive, yet still healthy, meal.
- * If you don't have musk ox, substitute with beef, caribou, or moose.

State Files Suit Challenging ANWR Decision

Governor Sean Parnell announced Friday March 14 that the State of Alaska has filed a lawsuit challenging the U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service's refusal to consider the State's carefully developed exploration plan for the coastal plain, or 1002 Area, of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

"It is both disappointing and disturbing that the Obama administration, which claims that it is pursuing an 'all of the above' energy policy, is afraid to let the people of the United States learn more about ANWR's oil and gas resources," Governor Parnell said. "The modern technology that we are seeking to use is responsibly utilized all across the North Slope with extremely limited environmental impact, and would dramatically improve our understanding of ANWR's resources. The State has filed this lawsuit to ensure all Americans have an opportunity to learn about the vast resource base Americans own in the 1002 Area of Alaska."

The State's complaint asserts that exploration of this area was mandated by the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act and is still authorized by the plain language of law today, despite the Fish & Wildlife Service director's assertion in his final administrative decision in September 2013, that his agency did not have authority to review the State's plan.

The Fish & Wildlife Service's position was primarily based on a legal opinion, issued by a Department of the Interior solicitor in the final days of the Clinton administration, claiming that these provisions of ANILCA had expired. Despite the numerous legal issues raised by the State in its filings, the Fish and Wildlife Service in 2013 refused to revisit its interpretation of the still-existent federal law.

The State's exploration plan was submitted to Secretary of the Interior Sally Jewell in July of 2013 and complies with existing USFWS regulations. The plan called for using advanced three-dimensional seismic imaging that would provide the people of Alaska and the United States with valuable information about the extent and accessibility of the significant oil and gas resources in the 1002 Area.

Senator Wielechowski urges Parnell Administration to uphold the Constitution and reconsider its new retiree health plan

Concern is mounting among retirees that the Parnell Administration is poised to reduce constitutionallyprotected health benefits they were promised as state and local employ-

The Administration recently came out with a revised retiree health plan. A public comment period on the draft plan was set to close on February 28 but has been extended to April 30 in response to public concerns.

The plan provides health coverage to 67,000 Alaska retirees and their families.

"The Alaska Constitution prohibits any diminishment or impairment of retiree benefits," said Senator Wielechowski, who recently urged the Parnell Administration to review and reconsider the draft plan.

"These benefits provide the foundation for a happy and healthy retirement," Wielechowski added. "They are part of the agreement struck with employees when they were hired. Changing the terms now of those agreements violates the Constitution and commitments made to many, many Alaskans."

Recently the Retired Public Employees of Alaska contracted with a health care expert to review the proposed plan. The contractor, a former benefits manager with the state and representative of AETNA, identified about 75 potential reductions and 10 enhancements of benefits in the plan.

"Many retirees are worried their benefits are being cut," Miller said. "The state must honor its commitment to Alaskans who devoted their lives to bettering their communities and Alaska as a whole.'

Wielechowski noted that the Administration has said its intent is not to reduce benefits. "If that's the case, they need to clarify the plan because it has certainly created lot of

State Helping Find New Partner for Pebble Project?

Northern Dynasty CEO contradicts Governor's statements on the Pebble Mine Project

Representative Andy Josephson (D-Anchorage) and Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) revealed statements from Northern Dynasty CEO, Ron Thiessen contradicting Governor Parnell's stated position on that he would reserve judgment until completion of the permitting process for the Pebble Mine.

In previous comments Governor Parnell has stated, "Politicians shouldn't be picking which projects get developed and which don't that leads to a corrupt "buddybuddy" system where friends are rewarded rather than science and the public dictating outcomes.'

However, earlier this winter at a presentation to the Resource Development Council and members of the Legislature, Ron Thiessen (Northern Dynasty CEO) said the state has said that it will "help us attract the next

Our Savior Lutheran Church,

Member of the Nome Ministerial Association

Below is a creative "new version" of Psalm 23 written by 16 middle school youth from our Youth Group/ Confirmation Class at church. They wrote this version to coincide with Iditarod:

The Lord is my Lead dog, I shall not scratch.

He takes me to the finish line, for my team's sake.

Even though I mush through the coldest of valleys,

His fur blows in the wind, his mind a compass and light—

He prepares the trail before me in the presence of my competitors.

And I shall mush with the Lord as my lead dog all my life long.

He makes me move on soft tundra snow;

I fear no fear, for he is the team leader.

He barks when I forget my sealskin hat.

Shall accompany me all of my journey.

Surely good views and the wind at our back,

He leads me over the frozen waters;

He restores my spirit.

These comfort me.

My sled overflows with joy.

investor for the development of the Pebble project."

"The governor has said the state is not putting a thumb on the scale with Pebble, but that seems suspect when hearing this from the project's major backer. Let's focus on attracting responsible resource development to the state, not a mine that jeopardizes the greatest wild salmon fishery in the world," said Josephson.

"The argument by the state that it is neutral on this mine always seemed highly questionable. If the state's promised to spend public funds to promote Pebble, Alaskans need to know about it," said Gara. "Pebble is located at the headwaters of the world's greatest fishing streams. It is a threat to them."

Removes hydroelectric feasibility study for Chikuminuk Lake

In response to testimony heard on Wednesday March 12, the Senate Resources Committee has adopted a new committee substitute for House Bill 77, which includes two changes. Senate Resources Chair Cathy Giessel (R-Anchorage Hillside/Turnagain Arm/N. Kenai) and the Department of Natural Resources (DNR) support these changes.

"DNR was present during Wednesday's hearing, listening to Alaskans, and responding by making adjustments to HB 77 that reflect the concerns of Alaskans," said Senator Giessel. "This ongoing conversation between the public, DNR and the Legislature over the past year has produced a bill that addresses Alaskans' concerns."

First, the new committee substitute removes the hydroelectric feasibility study for Chikuminuk Lake. This change was underscored by Senators Lyman Hoffman (D-Bethel) and Gary Stevens (R-Kodiak), and Representative Bryce Edgmon (D-Dillingham) who represent the region where Chikuminuk Lake is located. The region has decided to move in a different direction and public testimony supported this change.

Last year, the Senate Finance Committee added the language for Chikuminuk Lake into HB77 from Senate Bill 32, which was originally sponsored by Senator McGuire (R-Anchorage). Senator McGuire also requested the language be removed from HB77 and removed Senate Bill 32 from the Legislature during Senate Floor Session earlier this afternoon.

The second change to the bill requires DNR to develop a work plan which sustains sufficient water in identified rivers necessary for the abundance and productivity of Chinook salmon. DNR will work with the Department of Fish and Game, legislators, consultants, interested organizations, persons and other departments as necessary for the purpose of properly protecting Chinook salmon stocks and habitat.

These changes are in addition to changes introduced Monday on HB77 in the Senate Resources Committee.

Senator French: "Why TransCanada?"

New reports raise red flags, call into question economic benefits of TransCanada partnership

JUNEAU – Recently released reports from independent legislative consultants indicate that a potential partnership between the state of Alaska and TransCanada could have significant and negative long-term economic impacts on the State.

"Independent consultants have presented substantive, data-backed arguments indicating a partnership between TransCanada and the state of Alaska could cost Alaskan families who burn natural gas to heat their homes hundreds of dollars per year," stated Senator Hollis French (D-Anchorage).

Administration presentations have leaned on TransCanada's expertise as a pipeline owner and operator, yet as consultant Roger Marks points out in his recent report, "the expertise to build and operate the facilities comes largely with the producers' involvement." (Marks, Pg 12)

Marks suggests the state should solicit bids, if a partnership concept is indeed the best economic and operational model for the state moving forward, stating: "If the enabling legislation is enacted, the state will essentially be giving TC a solesource contract worth tens of billions of dollars to transport the state's gas." (Marks, Pg 11)

Another analysis, by Enalytica, suggests TransCanada's involvement could cost the state upwards of $500 million per year in cash flow, versus a scenario in which the state proceeded as a partner in the LNG project alone. Furthermore, in the same analysis a stress test case scenario found the only situation in which Alaska could experience annual negative cash flow is by partnering with TransCanada. (Enalytica, Pgs 1-2)

"These reports raise considerable questions about the administration's proposal to enter a long-term business deal with TransCanada. As legislators our obligation is to enable and negotiate the best business deal for the citizens of Alaska. We all want a gas line, but a sole-source contract that could potentially cost Alaska tens of billions of dollars and runs in the red every year is not a good business deal for the State," said Senator French.

means to be an American than most of those currently in power will ever know, in my opinion! "They just don't make men like Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln or Teddy Roosevelt any more.

H. Rick Tavares Campo, California, 91906,

Dear Editor:

A Tale of Two Cities

The last time I laid eyes on my adopted city of Nome, I was leaving her. As my flight circled out of Nome and headed to Anchorage, I looked once more over the landscape I had come to love, and a people who had befriended me and welcomed me into their hearts, their homes and their unique city. I had spent two winters here, and in that short time. Nome and its inhabitants had completely captured me. I would never be the same, and I would never forget the experience.

When I had first arrived, the saying "There is no place like Nome" struck me as a poorly disguised cliché. Now that I was leaving, the truth of that saying was driven home with bitter impact. There really is no place like Nome, and yet, perhaps there is a place with surprising similarities. I have discovered two cities. sister cities in so many ways but distinct as night and day. That other city is Virginia City, in Nevada, and this is a tale of two cities.

Nome and Virginia City are thousands of miles apart but share a legacy that makes them sister communities to a degree that is remarkable. Both born of the quest for precious metal, both carved out of difficult terrain, and both built from the character of a people that knew no quit! Yes, these are two cities that are siblings of the west - unmistakably the progeny of guts and grit.

As these two communities have woven their way into my heart, I have come to appreciate those special features of these two that make them so similar, and celebrate even more, the uniqueness that makes them so distinctive. I am forever bound to both and eternally grateful for what they have given me.

If you are to truly know either of these cities, you must first learn of their origins and past. It is there, that you come to grasp the fabric of their character. Both began as tent cities, the rough and tumble conglomeration of make do accommodations that every boom community of the nineteenth century started from. At first glance, the new arrival might wonder what kind of folks would choose to live like that. But every newcomer soon realized it was not the tents, shanties and shacks that defined these two infant towns. It was the strength and metal of the people that embodied the nature of both. It was the adventurous and self-reliant spirit that not only spawned Nome and Virginia City, it was that same spirit that would, through much effort and trial, over time, build them into lasting signature communities.

Today, each city is first noticeable by their hallmark mountains. Nome has Anvil Mountain as its picturesque backdrop, while Virginia City sits comfortably in the shadow of Mt. Davidson. From the heights of either, one can gaze down on the panorama and testament to fortitude and fortune. Postcards and advertising would be lacking if these bigger than life stone monuments did not add their beauty and mystery to these twin communities.

Speaking of bigger than life, both of these illustrious cities have been visited by the famous and the royal. In their day, when at the apex of their glory, Nome and Virginia City were the biggest, the brightest, and the must visit place on every socialite's list. The lure of fame and fortune, as well as the bragging rights of saying "I was there," brought presidents, millionaires and captains of industry, to walk their narrow streets. Their brief time in the spotlight also produced snapshots of western icons. From Virginia City, Samuel Clemens grew into Mark Twain, and Nome proudly proclaims the period that Wyatt Earp was a proprietor in its business community.

Icons of another sort remain today, in these two descendants of the gold and silver rush. One cannot visit Nome without noticing the giant forms and outlines of the gold dredges, now silent testaments to the herculean efforts expended to extract gold from the frozen environment. Likewise, no visit to Virginia City can escape the visual image of the towering head frames that once lowered iron willed men into the sweltering depths of the mountain, and brought out such riches that almost defy imagination. In one city, the bone chilling cold made extracting the precious gold a nightmare at times. In the other city, the sweltering heat in the depths of the mines sapped men's strength, as they struggled to claim the Comstock's silver wealth. Dredges and head frames, post card images today, that attest to year it was $1 billion. The Governor's request for this year is $426 million. We don't know how much the legislature will add, it may be as little as $75 million. That means fewer projects for infrastructure such as health clinics, water and sewer, heavy equipment, community buildings, energy etc. In terms of cuts to the operating budget it means fewer programs, less road maintenance, fewer state employees, and much more.

Whereas in previous years we tried to get as much additional funding as possible...the game has now changed to being one of trying to minimize the cuts that occur in every legislator's districts. This has profound consequences for Rural Alaska because there are already so few jobs, and the programs that do exist are much needed. My mantra has been cutting 1 job from a village of 300 people is like cutting 1,000 jobs in Anchorage with a population of 300,000. Or cutting 1 job from a town of 3,000 is like cutting 100 jobs in Anchorage. One of the guiding principles within our Bush Caucus is that any cuts made should not fall disproportionately on Rural Alaska.

What's being done to address the revenue shortfall? SB21 is legislation that passed last year to incentivize oil companies to invest more in Alaska and thus increase production. The incentive is in the form of tax relief. The question is whether or not this tax relief will lead to more production or just less tax revenue. I voted against SB21 as I did not believe that production increases (in any) would be sufficient to offset lost revenue. There is a citizen's initiative that will appear on this November's ballot asking voters whether the law should be repealed.

Constitutional Amendment. The Alaska Constitution states: "No funds shall be paid from public funds for the direct benefit of any religious or other private educational institution." House Joint Resolution 1(HJR1)/Senate Joint Resolution(SJR9) is the first step to remove this sentence from the Constitution. In order for this to happen it must receive a 2/3 vote in both the Alaska House and Senate. Then it would go before the voters and need a majority vote. And finally legislation would need to be proposed and passed to formally make the change. Supporters of HJR1 call this "school choice" that allows parents to decide where they want the money to go to fund their child's education. Opponents call them "vouchers" that would decrease the already limited funds that public schools receive. Some folks have said this is not a rural issue because there are few if any private or religious schools in Rural Alaska that are eligible for this funding. Others have said that both rural and urban schools have been receiving one-time energy and transportation funds over the past few years that could be in jeopardy if the State starts funding thousands of privately funded students. So far our school districts and constituents have come out against such an amendment.

I will be listening closely to expert and public testimony to make a fully informed decision.

Speeches. Each year the Legislature is addressed by various dignitaries on issues important to the State. Senator Lisa Murkowski gave her annual address about our federal government. Alaska Supreme Court Chief Justice Dana Fabe gave her State of the Judiciary. And Governor Sean Parnell gave his State of the State address.

In her February 19 address Senator Lisa Murkowski talked about federal overreach on a number of fronts (for example EPA involvement with the Pebble Mine), her defense of gun rights, her support of efforts to promote safety and economic opportunities in the Arctic, and fully funding Alaska Native Health Care.

Alaska Supreme Court Justice Dana Fabe gave her State of the Judiciary on February 12. She talked about the role that therapeutic courts have had in helping to reduce the rate of alcoholics going back to jail. She talked about the need to lessen the adversarial nature of child-custody battles. And she addressed the need to assist judges in rural areas by getting them more resources. In last year's speech Chief Justice Fabe stated: "For courts to effectively serve the needs of rural residents, justice cannot be something delivered in a far-off court by strangers, but something in which local people...can be directly and meaningfully involved." This has led to a renewed emphasis on "circle sentencing" where a small local community can help a judge to hand down a sentence.

In his January 22 address Governor Parnell talked mainly about education, pension funding, and a natural gas pipeline. For education the Governor supports school choice (otherwise known as vouchers), and increase in the base student allocation (from $5,680 to $5,765 per student), repealing the high school qualifying exam, and increasing digital learning and rural access. For the State pension the Governor would like to take $3 billion from the State's current $17 billion in savings and apply it the pension liability. By making a lump sum now this would reduce the yearly payments required in the future. For the natural gas pipeline the Governor would like for the State to take an equity position and thus be able to share in the profits of the pipeline. The total cost of a large diameter pipeline is estimated to be $45 - $65 billion.

As a side note our district is a member of both the Bush Caucus and the Interior Delegation. Both groups recently had lunch with the Governor to talk about issues important to our constituents. Two significant issues that we discussed were the challenges and opportunities of the Arctic and the high cost of

With regard to the Arctic we are seeing climate change open up routes within the Arctic that were previously inaccessible. As a result there has been an increase in ship traffic through the Bering Strait for the shipment of goods, resource exploration, and tourism.

Opportunities exist to increase economic development and jobs in Alaska. But the challenges are that much-needed infrastructure has yet to be built including ports, navigation aids, spill response capabilities, Coast Guard bases, logistical support chains and more. The Governor also sees ports as being important because they show we have a presence and thus convey state and national security value.

During our lunches with the Governor I brought up the issue the richness of the history of Nome and Virginia City.

My adopted cities, my two favorite locations in this great nation, have so much more to offer. In Nome, if you stay any length of time, you will become acquainted with her quarrelmascot, the Muskox. some Temperamental, definitely not domesticated, and not the least afraid to wander into town, the muskox is the epitome of wild Alaska, yet, there they are, sometimes right in town. As for Virginia City, nothing says the Wild West like a band of wild Mustangs, grazing on the hillsides as you drive up to town, or seen running with wild abandon along a ridgeline just outside the city. A wild mustang stallion, mane flowing in the wind, looks at you and seems to say, "Freedom is such a precious thing"

For all their history, for all their rich heritage, the twin cities of Nome and Virginia City are not just about the past. They are both alive today, committed to a future full of promise. In both, the precious metals that brought them into existence, still contributes to their economy today. The technology has changed, and the methods are different, but miners, and a broad assortment of other business enterprises, still provide the essential foundation of a living, active community.

My wife and I were married in Virginia City some 36 years ago. We loved the city then and we love her now. I have the privilege of working on the Comstock today, of being intimately involved in living history, in present stability, and in future benefit. Having been fortunate enough to live in Nome for a wonderful period of time, that community likewise has taken hold of my heart. Were it possible, I would be a delighted citizen of both. As I have listed all the amazing similarities between these two, you can see, I hope, why each is so special. However, at the end of the day, it is not the sights, the history, or the beauty of the land, as awesome as it is, that most endears these two places to me. More than anything else, it has been, and is, the people, the citizens of both Nome and Virginia City, that I celebrate. The depth of character, the spirit of adventure, the honest hardworking soul that does the right thing, just because it's the right thing to do, that is what ultimately makes me proud to say, "I know these folks, and they are what make American communities strong."

Thank you for being who you are, and for sharing what you have, with me!

Rick Martin (Former Nome resident 2007-08) Virginia City, NV of energy. I told the Governor that just as our nation looks to become energy independent so must our rural communities strive to become energy independent. The Power Cost Equalization (PCE) program is a great program in the short-term. Some see it as a subsidy program. But I do not see it that way. The PCE program is no different than a hydro dam or a natural gas pipeline. The goal of PCE, dams, and pipelines is they all help to make energy affordable. The problem with the PCE program is, however, that it's a fund with nearly a billion dollars in it today. As deficits loom the risk that this fund could be raided increases. A dam or a pipeline cannot be raided. And that's why in the long term we need energy independence that includes actual infrastructure.

The challenge in rural Alaska is that there is no one energy solution such as hydro or natural gas. It will take a variety of energy projects to achieve our rural energy goals. Such projects include biomass in the interior, renewable wind energy in Western Alaska, geothermal in places such as Nome and more. There are bold plans to connect Rural Alaska to a network of high voltage direct current (HVDC) lines that would be electrified by a natural gas plant on the North Slope. We're looking at ways for the State to fund a portable drill rig to send out to small communities that have natural gas. One energy solution that can be applied in all areas of the State is weatherization. This has been referred to as "picking at the low hanging fruit." It is easy and yields a big return on investment. Ultimately my message to the Governor was that as we contemplate spending billions on Rail Belt energy projects we must also be investing in Rural Alaska as well.

Nome Common Council votes to increase Port fees

By Sandra L. Medearis

Fees at Port of Nome are ready, set, to go up for the upcoming shipping season.

The Nome Common Council voted the revised port Tariff 10 into second reading Monday night.

The Port of Nome Commission handed the tariff up to the council panel for approval after raising fees by 5 percent across the board for all categories of uses save idle boat storage.

Last spring, Port of Nome raised its fees by 10 percent across the board. At that time commissioners tentatively planned to hike fees another five to 10 percent for 2014 and

2015

Home-ported vessels dry-docked within the Port of Nome that remain idle throughout the applicable period will pay a flat rate for winter season and a different schedule of rates for the summer season. The fee for small vessels shorter than 32 feet have been reduced in both seasons while operators of larger vessels will see an increase. The commission has taken into consideration that longer vessels cover a significant footprint at a port already crowded.

If the council approves the tariff revision for final passage at its next regular meeting, the document sets fees for idle storage thus: For winter, vessels 32 feet and under in length, $500, a decrease of $50; over 32 feet to 52 feet, $1,000, an increase of $120; vessels over 52 feet to 72 feet, $2,000, an increase of $680; vessels over 72 feet to 92 feet, $2800; vessels over 92 feet, $4,500.

For summer rates: 32 feet and under, $400, a decrease of $40; over 32 feet to 52 feet, $800, up by $30; over 52 feet to 72 feet, $1,600, up by $700; over 72 feet to 92 feet, $2,200; vessels over 92 feet, $3,300.

The winter storage season lasts seven months, whereas the summer storage covers five months.

The port commission debated on fee hikes over several work sessions before unanimously approving the draft tariff document that went to the Council.

Radiation sampling to happen for Bering Strait

By Diana Haecker

Regional concerns about the possibility that Bering Sea waters could be radioactively contaminated from the 2011 failure of the Fukushima Dai-Ichi nuclear power plant spurred local organizations to act.

University of Alaska, Fairbanks Marine Advisory Program agent Gay Sheffield and Norton Sound Economic Development put money towards a crowd-sourcing website organized by marine radio chemist Dr. Ken Buessler of the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution and its Center for Marine and Environmental Radiation.

The website is part of the project "How radioactive is our ocean?" and functions as a portal for donations. These donations are going towards the analysis of ocean waters for radioactive materials at a specific site.

For each $600 raised, a sample can be sent to Dr. Buessler's lab in Massachusetts.

Although experts and government officials don't believe the radiation from Fukushima poses any threats to fisheries or marine life, data is necessary to put concerns of coastal residents and subsistence users to rest.

This is the reason behind the website that aims to collect money from anybody in the world to finance radiation testing of Bering Strait waters.

"People throughout our region have repeatedly asked for testing of our subsistence foods and water," said MAP agent Gay Sheffield.

"Seals fell sick with a still unknown disease, we've had the documented first cases of avian cholera in Alaska, we've had unusual animals like the beaked whale showing up dead on the beach near Gambell and each time people throughout the re-

Booth raced on his blue warhorse, a 2003 Polaris 800 XC that carried him to victory in last year's 200-mile Archie Ferguson/Willie Goodwin Sr. Memorial snowmachine race. After securing the Kotzebue victory, he expressed that he'd like to win one more Nome-Golovin race.

Last Saturday he did.

Last Saturday ne did.

Under clear skies, calm winds and perfect temperatures in the 20°F range, 20 snowmachine racers gathered at the start line just off the Nome seawall on the sea ice. Unlike other years, the racers did not gather in town and then proceed in a parade down Front Street. Instead, they checked in with officials at the ramp near Subway and went onto the sea ice from there.

Usually, the race takes place on the second Saturday in March, but due to bad trail conditions, the race was postponed to March 22.

On Saturday, the noon start went off without a hitch and racers left the start line in 30-second intervals, to the cheers of many spectators.

Two Bering Air helicopters and one fixed wing airplane escorted the racers down the coast and back.

This year, no injuries were reported. Although crashes occurred resulting in lost windshields and crooked handlebars, nobody was hurt or had to scratch due to an injury

All scratches were related to mechanical issues of the snowma-

Letters –

Welcome to spring, everybody. It's great to see the sun and finally get some warmth. Let's not forget that it is still icy and, at times, is perilous to navigate around Nome. It is particularly challenging for people who are walking. Sidewalks are not given the same attention that streets are. Pedestrians need to walk where they get the most traction. At times that traction is near the curb, or close to parked cars. We all need to be responsible, but please remember that a car weighs a lot more than a person and can't fall on the ice either. #### No Public Money for Private Schools

Our public schools are the soul of our communities and they are the center of the universe for our youngsters. Adults brag, "I went to East. I went to West. I went to Mt. Edgecumbe. I went to Nome-Beltz.' Schools aren't cheap. Education costs money, but our schools are our brand and we strive to make them the very best.

The State of Alaska contributes money for public education. It is the obligation of the state to fund our schools and the federal and local governments also provide support. We strive to hire the best educators, purchase the most modern technology and provide pleasant and safe surroundings for learning. Our governor and some legislators just don't get it. They underfund public schools and siphon the life blood out of the school budget. They slither into our brains with smarmy excuses for providing vouchers for private schools. Our public schools are our future and they need adequate funds. We must never even consider using public money for private schools. The framers of our federal and state constitutions got it right when they championed the concept of separation of church and state.

State funding of religious schools sticks in our craw. Sure folks have the right to attend private schools if they wish, but they should pay their own way and not expect public money to pay their tuition. Private schools should be funded by private money— not by slithering around the law by taking the "voucher" excuse. Of course western Alaskans have a sense of humor- we could voucher all of our students to the Kamehameha school in Honolulu. Molly Hootch would get a good laugh. -N.L.M.-

Administration Confirms: Much Larger BSA Increase Needed to Fill Education Shortfalls

Governor's proposal three to six times too small to pre-

JUNEAU - A new analysis of Parnell administration data confirms Alaska's school districts need between three and six times the amount the governor is proposing to increase per-student classroom funding in order to fill budget gaps for next school year. Representative Les Gara (D-Anchorage) released the analysis as the House Finance Committee considers the governor's omnibus education bill and other education measures.

"Parents, teachers, and business leaders all know our schools need a stronger commitment from the state, and they've joined Democrats in calling for more classroom funding through the BSA—the money schools can count on year after year," said Gara. "Now the administration's own numbers confirm the public is right, Alaska's schools need a much, much larger BSA increase to prevent a fourth year in a row of teacher and staff cuts.

Sunrise 03/27/14 0

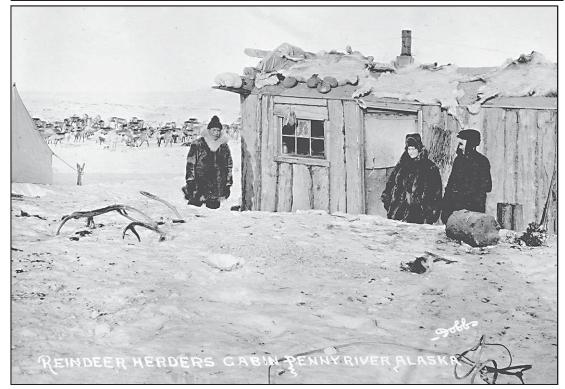

The analysis of six of Alaska's largest school districts shows those districts would need between roughly $245 to $464 more per-student in the Base Student Allocation next year to offset budget shortfalls. The governor's proposal adds $85 net year.

Gara's analysis used figures provided this week by the Alaska Department of Education and Early Development Finance Division which show the financial impact of specific BSA increases on each school district in the state. Gara used expected budget shortfalls from the Anchorage, Fairbanks North Star Borough, Juneau Borough, Kenai Peninsula Borough, Kodiak Island Borough, and Matanuska-Susitna Borough school districts as published in a March 5, 2014 Legislative Research Services report.

Alaska urges feds to consider AK priorities

The Alaska State Legislature unanimously passed House Joint Resolution 24 urging the Federal Government to consider Alaska's priorities and work with the State when the United States becomes Chair of the Arctic Council in 2015. The resolution also asks State Department representatives to confer with Alaskan officials while considering an individual to lead the Arctic Council.

HJR24 and its companion bill in the Senate are the result of work conducted over the past year by the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission.

"Globally, all eyes are on the Arctic right now and Alaska is America's Arctic," said Senator McGuire. "Alaskans have an opportunity to lead the United States in forming a strategy for our Arctic that realizes the state's prominent role in decision making. Acting now, we can seize the opportunity. The United States will assume the Chair of the Arctic Council in one year. It is imperative for Alaskans to be considered during that decision process of the appointment of that Chair."

The Arctic Council is the intergovernmental forum in which all eight Arctic Nations participate. Canada is the current Chair of the Arctic Council. The United States will be the Chair from May 2015 through May 2017.

In addition, with the passage of HJR24, the Legislature is now formally on record as supporting the strategic recommendation in the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission's preliminary report delivered to the Legislature in January to continue to "pursue, and actively expand, all avenues of participation in the Arctic Council, including involvement in working groups and by building partnerships with permanent partici-

University of Alaska Fairbanks finds genetic differences between polar, brown and black bears

of Natural Resources and Extension and colleagues at the University of California Davis and Delta G Co. published a paper on bear genetics in the Journal of Heredity online in January. The paper describes the research involving genome sequence comparisons of the three bear species.

The 2014 paper includes analysis of genetic variation in more than 300 bears from Alaska and genetic elements not assessed previously in bears. These are known as ultra-conserved elements, and show the polar and brown bears to be more closely related than either is to black bears. The data suggest that polar bears and brown bears diverged as different species 1.2 million years ago, and black bears diverged from the polar/brown bear lineage 2.3 million years ago. These estimates are within the ranges in other studies.

"The ramifications are that if the polar bear was an independent species for about 1 million years it survived previous cold and warm periods," Cronin said. "This means the polar bear has been an independent lineage a long time through glacial and interglacial and warm periods."

The last glacial period was at maximum extent about 22,000 years ago, and was preceded by a warm interglacial period about 130,000 years ago. Other warm and cold periods preceded that. Cronin thinks that if polar bears survived previous warm periods in which there was little or no arctic summer sea ice, this should be used in models predicting the species' response to current climate change. "It seems logical that if polar bears survived previous warm, icefree periods, they could survive another. This is of course speculation, but so is predicting they will not survive, as the proponents of the endangered species act listing of polar bears have done.'

Russians fund anti-pollution in

The Arctic Journal reports that Russia's Ministry of Natural Resources and Environment and JSC VTB Bank last week signed agreements with the Arctic Council making it possible to launch an anti-pollution funding program called Project Support Instrument.

Russia contributed $14 million to the Project Support Instrument, which is an Arctic Council initiative to prevent and clean up pollution in the region.

Approving the money for the PSI comes after Russia had already changed a number of laws in order to allow it to better deal with oil spills and to establish a system to monitor the marine environment in regions where economic activity takes place.

Other contributors to the PSI. whose value now stands at $22 million, include Finland, Iceland, Norway, the Sámi Parliament, Sweden and the U.S.

Lloyd's to develop its own regulations for Arctic shipping

The Arctic Journal reports that as UN is preparing international guidelines for polar shipping, insurer Lloyd's of London says it plans to release its own regulations for sailing in the Arctic as a way to ensure that ships are adequately prepared to sail in a region of "extreme and fast changing risks."

The regulations would serve to complement the International Maritime Organization's forthcoming Polar Code of safety and environmental standards, but it also pointed out that a lack of information about polar ice and differing national guidelines could undermine the effectiveness of the IMO guidelines.

The announcement comes after Lloyd's in January expressed concern that the growth of Arctic shipping traffic was "outstripping policy makers' ability to create a legislative framework in the high north."

Major shippers, including Maersk, a Danish conglomerate, have said they do not expect Arctic routes to be commercially viable for at least a decade. Overall, Lloyd's predicts investment in the Arctic could exceed $100 billion within the next decade.

READY TO GO— The Bering Sea Lions Club Nome-Golovin Snowmachine Race offered a prize purse of $24,850 that was paid out to the top three racers in two divisions. The City of Nome and several other businesses and organizations sponsored the event, held on March 22.

along with suggestions from the project director, Joy Baker, that any less of an increase would tax the port budget in meeting the costs of operations, labor, maintenance, repairs and expansion. Port of Nome has to raise fees to show fiscal responsibility to funding agencies, she said.

"We're not trying to expand on the backs of the users," she stated. Sixty to 80 percent of improvements are backed by outside money, Baker said, but Nome has to foot the bill on matching funds.

"It's the price of growth. It's a good thing for the facility and it's a good thing for the town. I expect it to continue."

One port user showed up at two work sessions to make comment on port fees—Phil Pryzmont, a fisherman who has two boats at the port.

"Nome's fees are higher than anywhere else in the state—Sitka, Yakutat, Seward, False Pass, Kodiak, Homer, Akutan, Port Moeller," he told port commissioners.

When the issue came up at the Council meeting March 24, Councilman Louis Green Sr. reminded the administration concerning who would pay the higher port use costs when they were passed along to consumers.

"The fees are collected from the people in town, not the companies," Green said.

Port of Nome required one employee in 2008 and now has four employees.

Increased marine business is driving the need for expansion, according to Baker.

In other business, the Council approved a resolution hiring Rolland Trowbridge to sort out and to maintain the City of Nome's radio and communications equipment.

Representatives of Nome's first responders—ambulance and Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. crews showed up to back Trowbridge and to emphasize the need for a local person to provide technical assistance and continuity.

The pagers in the system have continued to cut out and interrupt dispatch with a tone when sending out voice communications.

"The firemen are getting their pagers opened without toning them with the interrupting tone during the voice for the ambulance calls," Tom Vaden, emergency services chair, said in a letter to City Manager Josie Bahnke. "This equates to the fire department volunteers getting unintentionally "paged" for a large number of ambulance calls." For the ambulance department, the interrupting tone is scrambling information and chopping up versions of the call on playback, delaying a proper response, according to Vaden.

Terms of the agreement call for

Terms of the agreement call for Trowbridge to receive a monthly retainer of $1,000 to perform an ongoing list of work orders. Additionally, Trowbridge will receive an hourly rate of $125 for approved professional services not included in the tasks underlying the monthly retainer.

The Council passed a resolution of support for the Dept. of Transportation and Public Facilities airport runway revision and expansion project to begin this summer. Among other attributes, the closure of Nome City Field would resolve the airspace conflict between planes with crossing flight paths using Nome Airport and Nome City Field. The project includes construction of a gravel general aviation runway within the Nome Airport boundary.

Finally, the Council passed a resolution recognizing Nome residents Kim Clark and Rosa Schmidt for their participation in Team Alaska at the 2014 Arctic Winter Games and to recognize their pledge to Choose Respect.

The Choose Respect program encourages treating women, girls and fellow Arctic Winter Games participants with honor and respect. Team Alaska is a Choose Respect Team, speaking out against violence against women and girls.

gion expressed concerns about the effects of Fukushima either in the air, and now with the approaching plume in the water," said Sheffield. "Public health and food security concerns are at the forefront of people's mind."

This website now allows anybody to donate funds towards ocean water testing for cesium 134 and 137, the radio isotopes that are particular to the ongoing Fukushima Daiichi nuclear plant leak.

"Through this small effort, the lack of data can be changed, and we don't have to wait for the government to do it," said Sheffield.

MAP funded the first $300 and NSEDC ponied up $600.

Kevin Keith, fisheries biologist with NSEDC, said that NSEDC had confidence that this is an endeavor worth doing.

"There have been concerns regarding radiation in the water. I guess we'd like to see what the first sample shows," said Keith.

According to Dr. Buesseler, the coastal fisheries remain closed in Japan near Fukushima, where there is a concern for some species, especially the bottom dwelling ones. Those are being tested and many have been found to be above the Japanese government's strict limits for cesium in seafood. The contaminated fish are not being sold internally in Japan or exported. Because of the dilution that occurs even a short distance from Fukushima, Buessler does not have a concern about the levels of cesium and other radionuclides in fish off the West Coast of the U.S.

Sheffield, said ideally, sampling should take place from St. Lawrence Island, which is located closer to the current that carries water from Japan towards the north.

Gambell Tribal President Eddie Ungott agreed and said that his village is very concerned about radiation. "If it comes our way, it might affect our marine mammals," Ungott said.

The concern is shared by his colleague in Savoonga. IRA President Paul Rookok, Sr. said they are worried about the health of marine mammals, their main food sources. He was happy to hear that the website to collect money for water testing is up and running. He added that St. Lawrence Island lies right in the path of the current sweeping up from Asia and Japan and would be a great place for collecting water samples. "We have nearly 300 miles coast line, so we should do several samples in different locations," Rookok said. "One sample wouldn't it cover all."

LENDING A HAND—Susan Wolf visits a "client" with a straw delivery as part of her volunteer work with THANKS MUCH—This canine clearly appreciates the new fluffy straw bed made by his new best friend Susan Wolf. As part of PAWS of Nome, Wolf and other volunteers decided to actively get involved to provide underserved pets with straw, even dog houses and pet food. In the summer, PAWS plans to provide services that extend to having volunteers walk dogs that otherwise won't be getting any exercise.

PAWS of Nome aims to help Nome's animals

By Diana Haecker

A group of volunteers by the name of PAWS – an acronym for People for Animal Welfare Safety — organized to help out Nome's animals in need of better care. PAWS was incorporated on March 5 and consists of a core group of eight people, including founders Susan Wolf and her 17-year-old daughter Alyssa.

"Our mission is to provide education and resources to positively effect animal welfare in Nome," Susan Wolf said.

The mother and daughter team has in the past volunteered with the local animal shelter, run by the City of Nome, under animal control officer Amy Smithhisler. Alyssa has volunteered at the shelter since she was five years old. At the shelter, which was then located off Port Road, Alyssa and her mom helped cleaning up, playing and socializing the animals that were transients in the shelter.

When Smithhisler moved away from Nome in 2012, the City did not hire another animal control officer. The animal shelter was relocated to the Nome Police Department, where officers rotate to take on the task.

Smithhisler had actively patrolled Nome for animal welfare, scooped up loose dogs and educated pet owners on proper animal care. Without the active involvement of an animal control officer in Nome, the Wolfs felt that something needed to be done to look out for Nome dogs.

Thus, PAWS was formed and is in its first stages of getting supplies to animals in need.

Walking the fine line between helping animals and not offending their owners is something that Wolf is very conscientious about.

"We want to keep this very positive," said Susan Wolf. "We are here to help, not to judge." She said that she and her daughter drive around the city and identify animals that are kept outside and need a little extra than is currently provided for them. In normal winters, Nome sees bitterly cold temperatures and howling winds that outside animals need protection against. This is best achieved by providing doghouses and fresh straw to dogs in need.

When Wolf identifies an animal in need, she approaches the owners and offers her help, may it be to provide straw for the dog, or even a doghouse, or nutritional pet food. She also educates owners on hygiene and the importance of removing dog waste from the dog's circle.

When she sees dogs tied up outside without adequate shelter or without straw, she offers to the owner that she gives straw, or even provide a dog house. "Most of the time, owners are not neglectful on purpose," she said. "They just don't know any better."

Since January, when the group formed, she and her daughter made 27 straw deliveries. Wolf also recently helped a "client" who couldn't afford a wheelchair – a prosthetic device that enabled her dog to rest the hind legs and walk on its front paws – by paying for it herself. In other instances, PAWS disperses nutritional kibble in ziplock bags with feeding instructions to the dogs' owners.

Nome City Manager Josie Bahnke applauds the group's efforts.

"The PAWS group is a demonstration of people coming together and filling a need where the City doesn't have the resources to do something," Bahnke said. "I have a lot of respect for Susan and her group to fill the need of our pet population."

Bahnke points to other partnerships the city has that work out well: The Nome Sportsman's Association, which maintains and manages the Sunset Shooting Range on City land, and the Nome Rotary Club, which helps maintain the East End Park.

PAWS put a proposal together to apply for a portion of NSEDC's community benefit share paid out to the City of Nome. PAWS was successful and received $2,200 for building materials to build dog houses, for straw, collars and leashes.

By securing this money, PAWS entered into a partnership with the Nome Youth Facility, where youth can learn some carpentry skills and build the doghouses for PAWS.

The recent Idita-Beer-Run, organized by runner Crystal Tobuk, was an unusual way to raise funds: volunteers ran a mile, drank a beer and donated the entry fee for that fun evening to PAWS.

Other volunteers like Chrystie Salesky said that she became involved to help out Nome's pets. "I wanted to help better their lives and educate people on how to properly care for their pets," Salesky wrote in an email correspondence with The Nome Nugget.

"I think there is a huge need for PAWS in Nome just judging by the loose dogs around town and some that need proper shelter and straw. If we can help a few pets and lead by example, I think it will have a snowball effect and the standard of care will rise"

She appealed to other animal friends in Nome to get involved, whether it is by coming to meetings or donating time and money.

Salesky also commented on loose dogs in town. "It is important to keep your pet secured in a pen or proper chain set up to ensure their safety. There are also a lot of animals that end up not having homes due to over breeding, I would like to see them spayed and neutered so we can control the population and find all the animals a loving forever home," Salesky said.

Getting an animal as a spur-of-themoment decision usually doesn't work out for the pet or the human, alike.

Salesky stressed pets require full-time commitments and that prospective pet owners should do their research on what breed would fit best with their lifestyle.

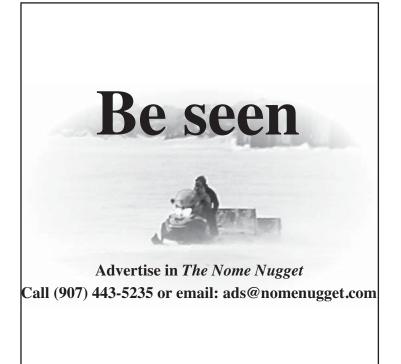

PAWS meets regularly twice a month.

Wolf said that donations of money and straw are welcome.

For now, she just operates her straw and kibble donations out of her car, but down the road she hopes to secure storage space.

Interested people can participate in meetings of PAWS, held every other Tuesday at 7 p.m. at the Northwest Campus offices. The group has also set up a Facebook page, named PawsofNome.

Nome Public Schools abuzz with activity; budget planning continues

By Kristine McRae

At their regular meeting last Tuesday night, Nome Public Schools presented two "Partner in Education" Awards. The award recognizes an individual or group whose efforts create or enhance learning opportunities for students. Nome Eskimo Community was recognized for the development and implementation of the Pathways grant, which, according to Nome-Beltz Principal Scott Handley, has made possible additional support for a number of students. Alicia Lane, who was hired as the teacher for math and science through the Pathways grant, described for the board some of the ways in which Pathways has made it possible to incorporate place-based learning for the students. The program was designed for students who have traditionally been lower performers in math and science, and the goal is to bring their scores up by the time they reach high school. Most recently, under the instruction of Maligiaq Padilla from Greenland, the students built a traditional kayak. "The students gained confidence and a sense of accomplishment," Lane said, "The Pathways grant has really provided a lot of enrichment activities that they normally wouldn't have, including one-on-one instruction and attention to individual student needs." For the culmination of the kayak building class, the students were tasked with presenting their roles in the process to an audience of fellow students, teachers, and elders from the community. Marsha Sloan, who worked on the planning for the multi-year grant, accepted the award for Nome Eskimo, saying "We really wanted to be a partner in planning in how we could bring more culturally relevant learning into the classroom." Other activities under the grant this year included seining for salmon and tanning fish leather. This is the first year," Sloan said, "We have two more years of this kind of instruction. We'll be involved in a reindeer project and the Native Youth Olympics.

The second Partner in Education Award was presented to Tom and BeeJay Gray, who for the past three years have hosted a cultural camp for educators at their camp on the Fish River. Board member Barb Amarok detailed aspects of the project. "Through their actions, Tom and BeeJay support educators with incorporation of subsistence knowledge in the classroom, culturally responsive interactions, school and home connections, creating a place for Indigenous knowledge in the classroom and building positive relationships," Amarok said. Over the past couple of years, several teachers from Nome and the Bering Straits School District have attended the cultural camp with positive reviews for its usefulness in the classroom. both culturally and academically.

Nome-Beltz teacher Weaver shared a movie created by students who participated in the Iron Dog Cultural Exchange. The video chronicled a whirlwind of activity and long hours of start and finish line set-up, interviews with racers, and travel between Nome, Big Lake, and Fairbanks. Weaver commended the students for their hard work and dedication to the project. Lacy Erickson, a junior at Nome-Beltz, shared some of her reflections as a participant in the exchange. "It was awesome to get to be a part of something that was so big. We didn't know it was so much work to put on a race. We were there at the very start, to set everything up, stayed for the activities, and then cleaned up," Erickson told the board.

> "Healthy Lifestyles" debunks myths on how people actually look

In his report to the board, Nome-Beltz Principal Scott Handley shared that the high school is working on community and student engagement directive. "Staff have been keeping communication logs," Handley said, "and we're getting closer to our communication goals." Handley also reported that the curriculum guide has been completed and updated, and he highlighted upcoming activities at Beltz, which include Driver's Ed, swimming, archery and bowling. Junior high teacher Rachel Ventress is planning a trip with students to Washington, D.C., and Amelia Budd is leading the sister school exchange. This district music festival will take place in Nome April 8-10.

Elementary school principal Bob Grimes reported that, in response to a group of girls who weren't eating lunch because they were concerned about body image, school social worker Rochelle Bushey invited a "Healthy Lifestyles" presentation from representatives of Kawerak's Wellness Program and the CAMP department at Norton Sound Health Corporation. Bushey said the presentation focused on healthy eating habits, active lifestyles, and debunking popular myths about how people actually look. "We hope to continue with these cooperative presentations,' Bushey said. Fifth graders at the elementary school attended the first presentation, and the fourth and sixth graders will have the opportunity after SBA testing completes next week. In other elementary happenings, Grimes highlighted visits to the school from a group of Olympic cross-country skiers, who took fourth, fifth, and sixth graders skiing after school for the week before Spring Break, Also, Iditarod musher Hugh Neff and three of his sled dogs made their annual visit to the school to promote the importance of reading and to visit with the children. Grimes told the board that the curriculum committee is nearly ready to present the new math curriculum to the board.

Head Start teacher Janet Balice, whose position is funded through the district's "pre-k" grant, updated the board on the progress of early education in Nome. Partners in the collaborative endeavor Kawerak's Head Start program and the Nome Preschool. "Data put together by the school district shows that Head Start and Nome Preschool students are still outperforming children who don't have early childhood education," Balice explained. "Without the schooling, only 19 percent are ready for kindergarten. After Head Start and Preschool, over 50 percent are ready." Balice added that the program is now tracking the students through kindergarten and beyond to gather information on how they are progressing. "In January, our students gained an average of 93 points," Balice said. "Looking at individual students, we can really see the kids taking off in kindergarten."

The junior high student of the month for February was Courtney Provost, whose teachers described as "very responsible, hard working, and good natured." Tyler Eide was recognized as student of the month at the high school. Tyler's teachers said, "He is caring, hard working, and honest." Tyler was also chosen for first team all state in basketball. The Alaska Society for Technology in Education has recognized ACSA student Erik Handeland as the ASTE Middle School Student of the Year. The recognition is statewide, and last year ACSA teacher Lisa Leeper received recognition for educator of the year. ASTE, according to their website, is excited to honor those who do amazing things, who demonstrate true technology integration and innovative teaching and learning in Alaska.

Budget Concerns

Board members continue to assess the district's revenues and expenditures for the 2014-2015 school year.

Burmeister mushes for healthy families

By Diana Haecker

Iditarod musher Aaron Burmeister had quite a tale to tell the nine youth at the Nome Youth Facility, who were rooting for him all the way through the 2014 Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race. Burmeister, just fresh off the Iditarod trail, visited the Nome Youth Facility on March 20 for an inspirational talk.

The Nome Youth Facility is the originator of a Mushing for Healthy Families campaign which aims to spread the message that alcohol and families don't mix, says NYF Stephanie Johnson.

"The purpose for Aaron to visit the Nome Youth Facility was to encourage the kids to set goals for themselves," said Johnson. By talking about the challenges on this very tough 2014 Iditarod, Burmeister spoke about how he himself reached those goals. Burmeister, son of two educators, stressed how he in his life was supported by his family and stressed the importance of education. Johnson said that just like finishing a dog race, Burmeister brought home the point that finishing education, no matter what level, is a huge step to achieve one's goals in life. In order to become employed, a person needs to have finished school or vocational training.

Johnson said the kids were fascinated by Burmeister's tales of survival, of the camaraderie between mushers and the teamwork with the

The youth at the NYF followed Burmeister's 2014 Iditarod run and when it became known that he sustained a knee injury out of Rohn, the kids made a poster, sent it to the checkpoint in Unalakleet, where he received it, realizing how many people were behind him and giving him the strength to keep on going.

BSSD basketball teams participate in "March Madness"

By Jeffrey Erickson
The "madness" may be linked to March, but basketball creates its own "madness" year-round in Bush Alaska. Folks can see swarms of village ballers out fighting the mosquito swarms under the midnight sun, they can see bundled up youngsters trying to dribble hardened balls on the snow and ice, and innumerable wannabe Kobe's soaring off couches for dunks on homemade rims in homes all year long. But, due to the culminating events of high school state championships in March, this is when it all gets even

Under the present structure, the Bering Strait School District can enter up to six teams in this four-day competition. Four 1A teams qualified and both Unalakleet Wolfpack teams finished in the top two of the Great Northwest Conference so they were able to send the full comple-

The 1A State Tournament is in the second year of a 16-team bracket, which requires play to start the Saturday before the championship brackets. While it is considered a "play-in" day, every team knows it is a "one and done" situation as well. Losers cannot compete for the championship. The four BSSD teams, Shaktoolik and Golovin boys and Shishmaref and Teller girls, were all capable of advancing but with the limited knowledge of their opponents, there was a sense of mystery.

The Shishmaref girls began things and quickly showed that, with their previous State experience, they would be a force to be reckoned with. The addition of Debra Hersrud, who'd helped defeat the Northern Lights as a member of the Noorvik team last year, provided veteran leadership. They easily dispatched Scammon Bay.

A young, but very experienced Golovin team seemed poised to make some "noise" as well, but ran into a very fundamentally sound Toksook Bay squad that made few mistakes but many shots to take down the Lynx. Teller's ladies had never made a State appearance and it showed early as they fell behind 10-0 to Chefornak. The girls regrouped and showed their talent level with a 17-1 run and never looked back, winning the game handily.

The top seed from the Bering Sea Conference, Shaktoolik Wolverines, returned to State hungry, having sat out last year due to a lack of gym facility. They pounced on St. Mary's early and often and, although the play was ragged at times, emerged victorious.

Shishmaref and Shaktoolik continued their strong play with convincing wins on Monday, defeating a balanced New Stuyahok team. Teller fell to eventual champions Newhalen.

Golovin couldn't bounce back against King Cove's superior size.

Being only a game away from the state championship game can separate the contenders from the pretenders but that wasn't the case in the boys tournament as the Wolverines gave the #1 seeded, and overwhelming tournament favorite Klawock Chieftains, all they could handle. They lost the game but gained fans with the unrelenting offensive pressure from senior "Boya" Rock and stunning poise displayed by freshman Everson Paniptchuk.

The Northern Lights girls showed they were contenders with their heady victory over the rival Kiana Shishmaref had never been in a State championship game. They were facing a very physical, and experienced team in the Newhalen Huskies. The team from Iliamna had won the state championship in 2012 and had manhandled their opponents on the way to the title game.

The Northern Lights never backed down, battling back from deficits many times during the game and, with little time on the clock, court general Denise Fernandez had a free throw to tie the game.

When it bounced off there was disappointment, but it was tempered with the satisfaction that the team had given all they had and achieved things never before accomplished.

The Teller Lady Aklaqs, led by dynamic All-Tournament player Jazzlvn Garnie, came back from their second round loss to win two more games and take 4th place in the tournament. Shaktoolik couldn't regroup after the draining semi-final game and ended up placing 5th.

1A All Tournament selections were Shaktoolik's Rock, Shishmaref's Hersrud and Garnie

The Shaktoolik Wolverines received the coveted Sportsmanship Award.

In the 2A tournament Unalakleet boys and girls teams represented BSSD for the second year in a row. The girls had stormed through the season defeating multiple 3A teams and defending their regional #1 ranking at the conference tournament. The boys had grabbed the second state slot at the same tournament after a 10-12 season.

Both teams faced the Bristol Bay Angels in the opening round. The Wolfpack boys ran into a buzz saw of offensive efficiency and were pushed into the loser's bracket after a disappointing 70-53 loss. The girls avenged that loss with a low scoring, but convincing win over the Lady Angels to advance to the semi-finals.

After a slow start against Haines the boys regrouped and led by senior Tristen Ticket and junior Gage Ivanoff they stayed alive with a hard fought victory. They closed out the tournament on the final day by defeating Nenana behind a dominant performance by Ticket. They got 4th

The Wolfpack girls got locked up in another defensive struggle with Metlakatla in the semi-finals until an explosion in the 2nd period led by Ada Harvey's long range shooting.

Leading comfortably at halftime they held on to grab a spot in the state championship game.

The championship game thrust the Lady Wolfpack against the heavily favored Dillingham Lady Wolverines led by 2-time Player of the Year Drew Carlos.

The Unalakleet girls showed no fear and battled their opponents from the south to a virtual standstill through three quarters.

Seniors Jonisha Wilson, Roberta Walker, Season Haugen and Brianna Katchatag refused to let the team get flustered but points were hard to come by until a run by Dillingham in the 4th quarter provided them a cushion that they held on to get the victory 30-21.

The boys team placed both Ivanoff and Ticket on the All-Tournament team while the girls had Wilson and Walker named. The Unalakleet boys also received the Academic Award.

WATCH OUT - Teller Lady Aklaq Jazzlyn Garnie shows a familiar sight — scoring another basket versus an overmatched opponent. Jazz Garnie made All-Tournament player and helped the Aklaqs to come back from a second round loss to win two more games.

Daniels leads Western Alaskan athletes at Arctic Winter Games

By Keith Conger

Two years ago, at the 2012 Arctic Winter Games in Whitehorse, Yukon Territories, Canada, the Russian contingent from Yamal declared that they would be bringing a snowshoe biathlon squad to the 2014 games for the first time ever; a claim they made good on last week in Fairbanks.

So, for Katie Daniels of Unalakleet, who had qualified for Team Alaska's Snowshoe Biathlon team last year at the rural state ski and biathlon championships sponsored by the Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Association, all that stood in her way for four gold medals this year, was that first-time Russian squad.

Daniels' impressive 2014 AWG results included individual bronze medals in the 4.0-kilometer Mass Start Race, the 3.0-kilometer Sprint Race, and the 5.0-kilometer Individual Race.

She also teamed up with Isaac McElwee of White Mountain, and Ryan Rieser of Anchorage for a silver medal in the Mixed Team Relay.

McElwee, too, had impressive individual results, winning a bronze medal in the 3.0-kilometer Sprint, and just missing another bronze medal in the 4.0-kilometer Mass Start by a mere 0.2 of a second.

Rosa Schmidt, who competed for Team Alaska on the Ski Biathlon team, represented Nome. Schmidt's best finish was 5th place in the 6.0kilometer Sprint Race.

Kaleb Korta of Galena, who also qualified for Team Alaska's Ski Biathlon squad at the 2013 WISA Championships, helped this year's mixed relay team earn a silver

Two athletes from Unalakleet competed for Team Alaska at the Arctic Winter Games in cross-country ski racing. Katie's younger sister Alv posted an impressive 11th place finish in the 7.5-kilometer Mass Start Classic race, and Sikulik Johnson's placed 16th in the 750-meter Sprint Classic.

While all biathletes ski using skate, or freestyle, technique, both Aly Daniels and Johnson competed in two events at AWG using the traditional "Classic" technique.

Biathlon disciplines are structured similarly to each other, with the only difference being the mode of transport. Athletes ski or snowshoe several times around a course, each time entering a shooting range where they gather their biathlon specific, .22 caliber rifles.

During each shooting session, athletes take five shots from a distance of 50 meters. In Junior Category races, which Daniels, McElwee, Schmidt and Korta all performed, athletes shoot half of their shots in the standing position at targets 4.5 inches in diameter. The remaining shots are taken in the prone position at targets that are only 1.5 inches in diameter. This was much harder than the WISA trained athletes were used to shooting in rural competi-

Hitting a biathlon target after skiing or snowshoeing with an elevated heart rate has been likened to trying to thread a needle while riding a snowmachine.

Depending on the race, missed shots result in the biathlete having to do either a measured penalty loop, or having a flat amount of time being added to the overall time.

Occurring every other year, the Arctic Winter Games is a high profile, circumpolar sports competition for northern and Arctic athletes. The games celebrate sport and promote social and cultural exchange.

The Arctic Winter Games started in 1970 with just a handful of events and only three contingents (Yukon, Northwest Territories and Alaska).

This year over 2000 athletes gathered from nine northern "nations" to compete in 20 different sports.

Arctic Winter Games participation is limited to regions located north of the 55th parallel. Joining the three original members are Greenland, Yamal, Northern Alberta, Nunavut (including Baffin Island), Nunavit (Northern Quebec), and the Sámpi Nation (northern Scandinavia).

The 2016 games will be held in Greenland.

White Mountain skiers dominate regional ski and biathlon championships

By Keith Conger

Aaron "Chipper" Bergamaschi led the White Mountain ski and biathlon squad to big success on their home turf at the 36th annual Bering Strait School District Ski and Biathlon Championships this past weekend. White Mountain teams placed first or second in all four divisions.

Bergamaschi opened a sizable lead on the challenging 8.5-kilometer ski course to capture the first gold medal of his young ski career. Teammate Julius Ione helped the White Mountain boys capture the high school boys team trophy.

Dominique Richardson of Saint Michaels was able to hit one more shot than Nome's Junyor Erickson, helping him capture the gold medal in the high school boys division of 5-kilometer biathlon race. Richardson earned a bronze medal in the ski event.

Erickson, however, captured the Skimeister Award, given to the skier with the best overall combined results over the weekend, by virtue of his double silver medal performance.

White Mountain's Joshua Prentice dominated the junior high boys division, resulting in his first Skimeister Award, by winning both the 5.7-kilometer ski race and the 5-kilometer biathlon race.

Unalakeet's Fischer Dill, with double silver medal efforts, and Tony Haugan with two fourth place finishes, teamed up to overtake the White Mountain junior high boys for the team title.

Kenneth Hafner of Nome won a bronze medal in the ski race as well as the biathlon. Hafner also won the junior high boys division of the marksmanship competition.

Bianca Trowbridge of Nome, Skimeister Award winner in the high school girls division, earned a gold medal in each of the ski events. Teammate Alexis Hutson chipped in a biathlon bronze medal as the Nome girls took the high school girls team

Rayna Buck-Nassuk of White Mountain, who added a gold medal in marksmanship to her two silver medals in the ski events, teamed up with ski race bronze medalist Anna Prentice to take second place in the division.

One of the most improved skiers at the meet was White Mountain's Jenny Hanson, who leapfrogged over all the pre-race favorites to post an impressive 2.5-minute victory in the 5.7-kilometer junior high ski race. Bronze and silver medalist teammate Felicia Ione would help the hometown girls capture the junior high team trophy.

Nome's Mallory Conger used 9 out of 10 shooting in the biathlon race to take the gold medal in that event. Conger's silver medal performance in the ski race would help her tie Hanson for individual skimeister points, forcing a tiebreaker. Hanson's lower total elapsed time gave her the award.

Maya Kralik and Shayna Warnke-Green, both of Nome, chipped in fifth and sixth place finishes to team up with Conger and outlast the Unalakleet junior high girls for second place in the team category.

The junior high girls division contained the only competitors to "shoot clean" (making 10 of 10 shots with a 22 caliber rifle at a 4.5-inch target at 50 meters) in the biathlon race. That group included Kralik, Jewel Wilson of Unalakleet, Warnke-Green, Ava Earthman of Nome, Rhiannon Noyakuk of Nome, and Kristyn Davis of Shishmaref.

Competitors not shooting clean during the biathlon competition had to do a short penalty loop for each missed shot. Each penalty loop can add from 15 – 30 seconds to the total time of the skier.

Most Improved Awards, given to the skiers who showed the biggest deduction in time over the previous year, went to Anna Peterson of Nome, Payton Commack of Unalakleet, and Gerald Kimoktoak of

OPEN THE FLOODGATES - Over 60 western Alaskan skiers get set to ski race at the 36th annual Bering Straits School District Ski and Biathlon Championships. The challenging course consisted of 2.85 kilometer loops going from the shoulder of White Mountain Hill to the Fish River and back again. High school racers did two laps (8.55k); junior high racers did two laps (5.7 k). The hometown team dominated the ski day with Aaron Bermamaschi winning the high school boys division, Joshua Prentice winning the junior high boys division, and Jenny Hanson winning the junior high girls division. Nome's Bianca Trowbridge was the only non-White Mountain skier to take gold on the day.

In the open division, last year's winner Bob Saccheus of Elim scratched, as did rookie Dale Ellana, and veterans Art Amoktoolik and Jarvis Miller.

In the A-Class every racer finished the racecourse.

Evan Booth was the first to cross the finish line, as race marshal Kevin Knowlton waved the checkered flag to take the official time.

Booth at first rested his head on the handlebars for a few seconds and then took off his helmet. He said he had to redo the engine the day before the race and that a cylinder was dropping coming into White Mountain. With half an inch of fuel left in the tank, he zoomed across the finish line. "It's been one heck of a day," Booth said. "I got this thing up to 120 mph multiple times, but generally we were doing between 90 to 100 and of course in the trees slowed down to 10-20 mph." Then Booth looked around the crowd and asked, "Did I win this thing?"

Family and friends cheered in response and he cracked a smile. As he took off his jacket, he thanked his family and said, "I dedicate this to my son Chase."

Booth took home the B Class winner's check of $5,100 and an additional $5,000 for winning the overall race. As a bonus, he also received the 2015 Iron Dog entry fee donated by the Iron Dog race organization. Booth said that he and Nick Reader have committed to the 2015 Iron Dog, with the support of Jim Wilke, Reader's father Charley Reader and hopefully with Polaris Racing as the main sponsor.

In the open class, Amos Cruise on a Polaris Switch Back raced to second place, in a time of two hours, 18 minutes and 47 seconds. Cruise took home $3,060. Sean Octuck Jr., rid-

Nanooks take fourth place at state 3A tournament

By Sarah Miller

The Nanooks boys basketball team closed its season with a 20-8 record and a Fourth place at the 3A tournament in Anchorage last week. Nome-Beltz was the highest placing public school in the tournament, with the top three places going to private schools Monroe Catholic, Grace Christian, and Anchorage Christian.

The first game against the favored team to win, Monroe Catholic of Fairbanks, took place on Thursday. The Nanooks had their work cut out for them, facing a team with three previous championship titles, a 25-0 season record and a 45 game winning streak going back to 2012-13. The Nanooks were led by Tyler Eide, who shot 13 points and also led the team in rebounds and assists. Cass Mattheis and Jake Stettenbenz scored 8 and 6 points respectively.

Nome-Beltz stayed in the game during the first half and trailed by only 7 points at halftime, but struggled to keep up with the Rams' of-fensive rebounding and scoring in the remainder of the game. Scooter Bynum led Monroe with 17 points and 10 rebounds but the victory went to the Rams with a final score of 56-36. Coach Pat Callahan commented on the game in an email, "I was really proud of our team's efforts in the Monroe game. We did a great job staying in against a very talented team." Monroe would go on to defeat Anchorage Christian School 56-50, and played Grace Christian School in the title game on Saturday, defeating them 58-47. Monroe's team featured Bynum, named Alaska Player of the Year, as well as First Team All-State player David Stepovich, Second Team player Tyler Wells, and Third Team player Jalon McCullough.

In its next game, Nome-Beltz played against Houston, defeating the Hawks 72-35. Cass Mattheis scored 17 of his 19 points in the first half to lead the way. Klay Baker scored 20 points and Tyler Eide added 8 points and 9 assists. Callahan noted that the game was closer than indicated by the final score.

In its final game against Sitka on Saturday, the Nanooks defeated the Southeast region championship team by 9 points, final score 60-51. Eide led the team, scoring 18 points for Nome in the first half and providing 11 assists in the second half, which allowed teammates to put points on the board. Mattheis contributed 12 points and 9 rebounds. Nome Seniors Matt Tunley, Briar Dickson, Tyler Eide, Jake Stettenbenz, Eli Johnson, Cass Mattheis, and Gwen Trigg-Komakhuk (cheerleading) were recognized for participating in their last high school basketball games. Callahan wrote, "It was really nice to see this group of seniors be able to go out with a victory in their last time on the court together. The victory also allowed our team to reach the milestone of a 20-win season. This milestone is a real testament to the hard work put in by the entire team, assistant coaches, and parents that do so much in terms of fundraising for the team."

The Nanooks received recognition at the tournament for an outstanding season. The boys team was honored with the Sportsmanship Award; Matt Tunley and Eli Johnson were named to the Good Sport Team. Rene Merchant was named to the All-Tournament Cheer Squad. Tyler Eide was selected to the All-State First Team and Cass Mattheis was named to Third Team All-State. ## How to prevent the brittle bones of osteoporosis

Alaska Family Doctor

Osteoporosis is a dangerous condition in which bones have lost a significant amount of calcium. Bones become brittle when they lose calcium density, which thereby increases the risk that a person will break a bone in what otherwise would seem like a minor accident.

It is common for people with osteoporosis to break an ankle, wrist, hip, or vertebrae from a minor twisting fall or slip on the ice.

Bone is living tissue that stores calcium. Just as the body puts extra calories in fat cells for use during periods of fasting, the body stores extra calcium in the bones for use when dietary calcium is low. This is why consuming calcium helps strengthen bones.

Bones also respond to stress or weight. Bones that bear weight become stronger while bones become weak with lack of use. The phrase "use it or lose it" applies to bones just as it applies to muscles and brain cells.

Certain hormones, like estrogen and vitamin D, play an important role in maintaining a balance of calcium in the bone. A drop in estrogen levels, as when women go through menopause, or low vitamin D levels from lack of sunlight or low salmon consumption, accelerate calcium loss from the bones.

Sometimes bone loss is a side effect of medical treatments. Steroid therapy for an autoimmune disease or medical treatment for hypothyroidism can lead to bone loss. Long-term use of the birth control shot Depo-Provera has also been associated with bone density loss.

Tobacco use and high levels of alcohol consumption prevent the body from properly absorbing calcium. This leads to bone loss in smokers and people who drink alcohol in ex-

It is important to remember that osteoporosis does not develop quickly. Bone density is lost over a span of years, even decades, before falling to the critically low levels of osteoporosis.

And since bone is always in a state of change, being built up or broken down, it is never too early or too late in life to work on building strong bones.

There are several simple ways to build bone strength. These measures help prevent osteoporosis and may even be used to prevent further bone loss in people who have already been diagnosed with osteo-

First, make sure you consume plenty of calcium. This is especially important for teenage girls, pregnant women, and women after menopause. Calcium is found in dairy foods such as milk, cheese, and yogurt. Vegetables such as broccoli, cabbage, bok choy, and kale are rich in calcium. Many cereals, breads, and some juices are fortified with calcium. Calcium supplements are also available over the counter for people who cannot get enough calcium from the diet.

Next, get your vitamin D. Vitamin D is a hormone that the body uses to regulate calcium absorption and repair bone. Low levels of vitamin D prevent calcium in the diet from being properly absorbed. Therefore, vitamin D from the diet or from mid-summer sunlight exposure is just as important as calcium consumption for bone health. Salmon contains high levels of both calcium and vitamin D making it a perfect food for building healthy bones. Vitamin D supplements are available over the counter for people who do not get enough in the diet or lack sunlight exposure during the long dark winter months.

Finally, exercise is an important part of bone health. Weight bearing exercises and strength training are especially important as we get older because the body stores more calcium in bones that are bearing weight or bones being used to support working muscles.

Doctors use a special X-ray test called a Dual Energy X-ray Absorptiometry (DXA) scan to test bone density and screen for osteoporosis. In general, a DXA scan is recommended for all women over age 65 and anyone, men or women, with increased risk factors for osteoporosis. Risk factors include low vitamin D levels, unusual fractures, family history of osteoporosis, or long-term therapy for thyroid disease or autoimmune diseases.

Doctors use a number of medications to slow the process of osteoporosis in people with advanced bone loss. These medications all have potentially serious side effects and therefore require a prescription and close follow up. If you have advanced bone loss, speak to your physician about the role medication may play in treating your condition.

Prevention, however, is inexpensive, easy to apply, and has very few side effects. Find ways to incorporate dairy, salmon, and exercise into your daily routine in order to lower your risk of osteoporosis and maintain healthy bones.

School Board budget planning

In his update to the board, superintendent Steve Gast shared the disconcerting news that the cost of a major, multi-step, improvement project came out almost one million dollars over the initial estimated amount. The initial estimate, in 2012, for the HVAC capital improvement project was $614,000. The district used this amount in their application for reimbursements from the state. Earlier in March the district received the final design submittal from RSA Engineering that puts the cost at $1,500,000. After discussing the various aspects of the project, the board was inclined to follow Gast's recommendation, which is to repackage the original project into three separate phases. "This would allow us to concentrate on the strongest areas of need first," Gast said. "It would also allow us time to discuss our options with the state regarding the current project award and the option to submit additional funding requests in the future to the state for other phases of the project." Coming up is the district's monetary appeal to the City of Nome. Each year, based on current legislation, the City is allotted a certain amount of money from the state, a portion of which is earmarked for the school district. The school board then makes a formal request for the funding and, in Nome, that amount averages between 57 and 63 percent. Other budget topics included the remodel of Anvil City Science Academy, operational equipment needed for school upkeep, technology costs and projected fuel usage. Gast told the board he would know better once the teacher contracts came in, what the staffing needs will be for next year. The high school is still in want of a principal, and the 16-member committee continues its search and application reviews.

Finally, as the board reviews current policies and adopts new ones, they have agreed to revisit the language in Board Policy 6145, which outlines school and extracurricular activities in which Nome Extensions students are eligible to participate.

from tribes but it has not processed even one of these applications. Each application can cost thousands of dollars, many hours of ground work and take years, so why should DNR get to wipe the slate clean and ignore all these applications?

Statewide resolutions against the bill came loud and clear. As a result, in the last few weeks DNR and legislators tried to change this section of HB 77 to allow 'fixing' some of the major problems of the bill. Now the bill seems to grant water reservations to DNR or DFG rather than to the tribes themselvess or an applicant that put in the time and money to jump through the application process. Why give that water reservation to agencies and not give it to the tribes? That is no solution at all!

For Alaskan Native tribes—having clean water in healthy salmon streams is very important! There are real threats that could mean that there is not enough water for fish. Companies that apply for what are called 'temporary water use' permits can remove water from the streams and threaten the salmon that live in the rivers. HB 77 allows companies to continue this practice with an easy renewal process, but makes it harder for the average person or tribes to protect our inherent rights to subsist. Our tribes may have a small population, but when bills like these are introduced in the state government they have a huge impact on us in the communities! These companies can come and go BUT we in the communities

And that's not all! The amended version of HB 77 does not help this water rights issue and it falls short of many other concerns. This is a large bill that tries to do too much, and in doing so misses out on the details.

During the week of March 10, there were two public hearings in Juneau on two different amended versions of HB 77. Well over 100 people testified against these amendments because they do not go far enough. As we try to keep up with the proposed changes, a pattern is clear: these are not compromises but false solutions. The amendments do not solve any of our initial problems with

In order to move forward with any changes, I invite Governor Parnell, the DNR, and legislators to come to our communities and involve us in the process to change this bill. I am certain over 40 tribes and communities would welcome the opportunity to be involved in the process rather than have to react to more and more versions of HB 77 at the drop of a hat. We cannot all make it to Juneau, so we welcome you to come to our communities, visit our streams, and let us work on these issues together.

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor Charles Brower Community United Methodist Church Member Nome Ministerial Association

Lent is the Christian season of preparation for Easter. Forty days prior to Easter (Sundays are not counted) many Christians observe a period of fasting, repenting, moderation and spiritual discipline. The purpose is to set aside time for reflection on our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ, his suffering, life, death, burial and resurrection.

Liturgical colors used for vestments and hangings for Lent begin with Green signifying "ordinary time", white during our Easter season, violet during the season of Lent, red for Palm Sunday and Good Friday, and finally a church without decorations and the Holy Table stripped bare after Maundy Thursday recognizing an empty tomb. The symbolism of colors serves to underline moods appropriate to the seasons of our liturgical year or may highlight a special occasion.

Love is very much a part of this season – John 3:16 assures us of God's love and promises eternal life for believers. In Ephesians 3 Paul prays that God may strengthen us with power through His Spirit. "And I pray that you, being rooted in and established in love may have power, together with all the Lord's holy people to grasp how wide and long and high and deep is the love of Christ, and to know this love surpasses knowledge that you may be filled to the measure of all the fullness of God.'

As we journey towards Jerusalem with Jesus, know we are loved. Peace and Shalom.

any I have received in my life or will ever likely receive again. The people of Nome and the surrounding communities were incredibly generous in allowing a first-time, Lower 48 college kid access to their homes and lives. From Daisy the musk-ox and the Midnight Sun Festival to the Raven Ranch and the Sea Shepherd organization protesting Soviet whaling practices, the community never lacked for news or people to keep the pages of the newspaper full. My Nugget newspaper tear sheets are a bit tattered and yellow these days, but I still treasure them because they represent a time in my life that broadened my understanding about our country and people that has remained with me to this day.

I have moved through my communications career watching companies, job titles and technology change. In fact, the one constant that has carried me from place to place, position to position and technology to technology is an insight I carried home with me from Nome to Detroit so many years ago: People are the only story that really matters because they make everything matter.

Hello to the fine people of Nome from the Lower 48. I hope, one day, I will again be able to share my greetings in person.

Dear Editor:

HB77 is Nothing New

With few exceptions, the State of Alaska's strategy for (quietly) limiting the rights of citizens to particiin resource natural decision-making and further insulate government and political officials from public oversight and scrutiny, has been working pretty well.

It started a couple of years ago, after Alaska became the only state in the country in which unsuccessful litigants are required to pay attorney fees when such fees are demanded by the prevailing party in state court cases. That the adoption of what is now known as the "Loser Pays Rule," by the legislature, was intended to target groups and citizens who have no where else to turn but state courts in attempting to protect natural resources, is illustrated by a set of bills adopted during last year's session that have gradually complemented the Rule in all but crippling the public's ability to participate in state agency natural resource decision making.

This trend continues in this year's legislature with HB 47 which requires a party seeking a pre-trial restraining order or similar action staying the operation of a permit affecting an industrial operation to provide a financial bond that would discourage most such litigants from seeking out the courts for help.

Yet a chink in the armor of Alaska's efforts to exclude every day citizens and Native tribal governments from decision making lead by Governor Parnell and the Department of Natural Resources, occurred during the end of last year's legislative session, after a record number of tribal resolutions and over whelming public comment in opposition to HB 77, which would restrict the rights of such citizens and tribes to protect in stream flows and fishery resources and participate in water and land resource decision making, were received.

When the bill came back this year even after overwhelming opposition during last year's legislature, however, everyday Alaskans had finally had enough and, this year, opposition to HB 77 has developed into a, statewide, grass roots, campaign. So, when over 40 tribal resolutions, huncus delivered a letter to Governor Parnell asking for the removal of Texas Oilman Richard Rabinow from the Alaska Gasline Development Corporation.

"Everyone but the Governor seems to understand the concept: Alaska boards and commissions should be filled by Alaskans," stated Senator Hollis French (D-Anchorage).

Governor Parnell refused to pull his nomination of California oil executive Dennis Mandell to the State Assessment and Review Board last week, after being notified by Senate Democrats that the appointment was in direct violation of Alaska statute 39.05.100. The appointee removed his own name from consideration after learning he did not have the statuary qualifications necessary to serve (Alaska residency). "The Governor's selection of an out-of-state oil executive is a slap in the face to the expertise of the many, many Alaskans who could fill the position," said Senator French.

Senate Democrats offer amendments to improve gasline legislation, protect Alaskans

Amendments defend Alaska sovereignty, protect property tax payers and potential Alaska gas consumers

JUNEAU - Members of the Senate Democratic Caucus offered amendments on the Senate floor to improve enabling gasline legislation, Senate Bill 138. Recently released reports by independent consultants retained by the Legislative Budget and Audit Committee raised important questions about project economics, particularly if Alaska partners with TransCanada as proposed by the Governor.

În total, Senate Democrats offered 16 amendments

Senator Hollis French (D-Anchorage) presented an amendment to establish the state of Alaska as a 51 percent owner of any sanctioned LNG project. Analysis of the current proposed project by independent consultants indicates Alaska receives little value from a minority equity position.

"Alaska is an Owner-State. Trading away our precious sovereignty in exchange for a position as a junior investment partner with the most sophisticated and successful corporations in world history is a recipe for disaster. We own the gas, period. The head of the table is the only seat we belong in," said Senator French.

Senator Johnny Ellis (D-Anchorage) offered a "No PILT (payment in lieu of taxes)" amendment to protect municipalities and boroughs ability to fund the expansion of schools, roads, and public safety services due to the influx of people and infrastructure related to construction of a gas pipeline.

"Alaska municipalities and boroughs deserve their fair share. The PILT payments unfairly burden the local governments that provide essential services such as public safety, roads, and schools. In the end, if it remains unchanged, the Governor's bill will pass on that burden to property tax payers, and that should have been unacceptable to every lawmaker. We want and support a gasline, not another giveaway," stated Senator Ellis.

Senator Berta Gardner (D-Anchorage) proposed an amendment that would halt payment from the State of Alaska to TransCanada, or any other midstream partners, if the project is not sanctioned.

"The heart of this project is an effort to align the interests of all stakeholders for both risk and reward, yet Alaska is taking TransCanada's risk — on the hook for repaying all TransCanada costs, with interest, if the project does not move forward to the next stage, regardless of which partner pulls out. This is not alignment," said Senator Gardner.

Senator Bill Wielechowski (D-Anchorage) offered an amendment to ensure the North Slope's three major oil producers, who together would control and own a majority stake in the gas pipeline as currently proposed, could not write off gasline construction expenditures on oil tax payments.

This legislation sacrifices Alaska's sovereignty and awards the biggest sole source contract in state history. Alaska needs to stop studying this issue and start building a gas line," stated Senator Wielechowski.

GOP Senator: "Birth control is for people who don't want to act responsibly'

Senator Pete Kelly also calls for free pregnancy tests in bar and restaurant bathrooms

ANCHORAGE: In an interview with the Anchorage Daily News Senator Pete Kelly (R-Fairbanks) says "he is declaring war on fetal alcohol syndrome disorders" by putting free pregnancy tests in bars and restaurants. In contrast to his support for state-funded pregnancy tests, Kelly said birth control "is for people who don't want to act responsibly."

In response to a question in the interview, Kelly rejected efforts that would encourage use of birth control:

This assumes that if you know you are pregnant you'll act responsibly. Birth control is for people who don't want to act responsibly. -Senator Pete Kelly

Instead, Kelly said the state should provide free pregnancy tests in bars and restaurants:

Literally, you can go into the bathroom at the bar and test. So if you're drinking, you're out at the big birthday celebration and you're like, 'Gee, I wonder if I...?' You should be able to go in the bathroom and there's that plastic, Plexiglas bowl in there...With the consent of the other senators I'm going to put some money in the budget to fund these things. —Senator Pete

Senator Kelly's comments come just two weeks after his GOP colleague Fred Dyson inaugurated what was labeled "the new Alaska war on women" by encouraging women to stop drinking lattes if they can't afford birth control, and suggested that women can airlift birth control to Alaska.

"Republicans need to stop their war on Alaska women," said Kay Brown, Executive Director of the Alaska Democratic Family planning could reduce the number of abortions by 360 per year, according to a recent study. In addition to reducing the number of abortions, data suggest that wider availability of contraception could reduce Alaska's highest-in-the-nation rate of certain sexually transmitted diseases.

dreds of participants in public hearings, commentary through radio shows, Op-eds, letters to the editors and petitions all illustrated unprecedented opposition, DNR (which is promoting the bill) was forced to agree to amendments.

It was no major surprise that the DNR amendments were sharply criticized during public testimony be-Resources Senate the Committee, almost immediately after they were announced, probably, because they amounted to little more then cosmetic improvements designed to make the bill look better without changing much of anything.

The changes to one of the most controversial provisions, for example, which eliminates the rights of tribes and citizens to apply for reservations to keep water in stream to protect fish habitat, on face value, now appears to allow individuals and tribes to seek such reservations. However, the amendments do not grant such entities the ability to hold those rights if granted but, instead, give the rights to another state agency, allow DNR to refuse to process those applications, and does not allow applicants access to due

After the amendments to HB 77 fell flat during their first public ap-Resource Committee pearance. Chair and industry loyalist, Sen. Cathy Giessel was faced with a dilemma - how to get the bill approved regardless of overwhelming public opposition? So, with over 100 people still waiting to comment, she cut off public testimony, stating that 'wasn't hearing anything new." This move, however, backfired, not only because testimony on the amendments, which were released just 48 hours prior to the hearing, could not have been anything but "new," but due to intense pressure to provide additional space for public comment, Sen. Giessel relented and scheduled another round of public testimony.

If the bill is moved out of Senate Resource, it would then go to Senate Rules, which would schedule it for a floor vote, then it would go to the House for a concurrent vote. That supporters of HB 77 have blinked (for now) illustrates that through continuing to testifying, making phone calls and comments and sending emails to law makers, we make sure it doesn't get that far! Alaskans must continue to tell the legislature that the amendments failed to provide anything new to eliminate the substantial threat that HB77 presents to Alaska's natural resources and citizens' constitutional rights.

ing a SkiDoo 800, also started in the open class and finished in third position with a time of two hours, 19 minutes and seven seconds. Octuck received a third place check for $2,040 and a $500 bonus for being the fastest Rookie of the race.

In the overall ranking, Nicholas Reader, raced across the finish line in a time of two hours, 17 minutes and 26 seconds.

Reader competed in the A class and won in his division. Reader took home a prize purse of $4,575. Nome racer Tre West placed second in a time of two hours, 20 minutes and 19 seconds, getting a prize check for $2,745. Donny Johnson came in third, in a time of 2 hours, 23 minutes and 28 seconds and earned $1,830.

As racers came in, swung around and parked their machines, droves of fans flocked to the competitors to hear firsthand tales from the trail.

Nick Reader was all smiles as he took off his helmet, jacket and protective gear. "I thought it was fun!" he said. "It was a fairly good trail. The roughest part was around Topkok and Timber, but I was catching up with a lot of people around there.

Not having had any problems mechanically or fuel-wise, Reader just flashed a smile and said he had fun duking it out with his fellow competitors.

Top rookie Sean Octuck Jr. also beamed a broad smile at the finish line, saying that he had a fast, smooth ride, except for going over the Topkok Hills, but his SkiDoo 800 performed fine. "I expected to be nervous, but just kept praying that I finish this race," he said. "It felt pretty awesome to cross the finish

The race didn't go so smooth for Gerald Hughes, who started in the A Class. He said he almost ran out of gas getting into White Mountain, that he crashed on the backside of Cape Nome and that his machine hit a stump coming out of Topkok. But still, he made it to the finish in a time of two hours, 25 minutes and 41 sec-

In comparison to last year's race, which had 44 racers competing, last Saturday brought only 20 racers to the start line of the 45th running of the Nome-Golovin Snowmachine Race. Twelve competitors started in the open class; eight racers started and all eight finished in the A Class (0-600cc).

Race marshal Kevin Knowlton said that bib #1 was dedicated to Frank Okleasik as a former racer and long time supporter of the race.

Dora Hughes was the only woman who signed up and was to race with the men, but a blown piston on her machine prevented her from even getting to the startline.

According to one of the event organizers, Kevin Bahnke, the race started in 1966. It was originally a snowmachine race from Nome to Teller and back. In the 1970s the course was changed from Nome to Golovin and back

Calvin Schaeffer from Kotzebue still holds the record time of 1 hour and 57 minutes and 11 seconds. Schaeffer set the record in the year 2000, on a Ski Doo MXZ 700.

The Bering Sea Lions Club is the prime organizer of the event. Bering Sea Lions Club President and Nome-Golovin race marshal Kevin Knowlton said that the total purse for this year's race was $24,850 and consisted of donations from top sponsors such as the City of Nome, Bonanza Fuel, Crowley Marine Services, Sitnasuak Corp., Iron Dog, the Nome Volunteer Fire Department, NSEDC and According to KNOM Radio. Knowlton, 20 other businesses and organizations made donations or volunteered.

NJUS: Nome declares independence from Big Oil

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome could start getting one-third to one half its electric power from a renewable geothermal source at Pilgrim Hot Springs at a fixed price over 20 years

This would be the largest renewable energy operation in the state.

Proponents say such a move would back a stable price for a portion of electrical power and reduce the community's reliance on diesel fuel with its volatile prices for fuel and shipping.

City officials, in signing a contract with geothermal developers of Pilgrim Hot Springs, have cleared the way for further investment in renewable energy to assure a supply of kilowatts not depending on fuel shipped on barges during a short season of ice-free open waters.

The Nome Joint Utilities board has been seeking diverse ways to hedge against rising diesel fuel prices. Nome has been under a siege from energy prices for some years because the fuel can come to Nome only during a few months per year.

Exacerbating that fact is that Nome's fuel price derives from an average price covering a few days at the time of loading, whereas the figure formerly derived from an aver-

Legislation opposes Beringia MOŪ

Introduced by Anchorage Senator Cathy Giessel, R-Anchorage, a Senate resolution opposing a Memorandum of Understanding between the USA and Russia to link Cape Krusenstern National Monument, Bering Land Bridge National Preserve in Alaska and Beringia National Park in Chukotka passed the

In her sponsorship statement, Senator Giessel wrote that the resolution urges the federal government "to cease pursuing the creation of the Beringia International Park" as it is pursued via a Memorandum of Understanding between Russia and the

The MOU aims to symbolically link National Parks in the Bering Strait region and calls for protection of the natural and cultural heritage of Chukotka and Alaska. It also aims to recognize the worldwide significance of the Bering Strait as an ancient crossroads. It would confirm the mutual interest of the USA and Russia to deepen cooperation and to strengthen ties in the area of the US-Russia boundary in the Bering Strait

The MOU contains language that notes the "important need to protect the rights of indigenous and other local inhabitants in Chukotka and Alaska and to ensure their access to natural resources in accordance with each country's laws.

While the MOU has yet to be signed by the President of the United States, Senator Giessel has asked her colleagues in the 28th Alaska Legislature to oppose the MOU.

In her sponsorship statement Giessel alleges that the planning for the transboundary park was done quietly and "without efforts to coordinate or consult the citizens of the

Board of Education grapples with budget uncertainties

By Kristine McRaeThe Nome Board of Education met last Tuesday in a work session for further discussions surrounding the district's 2014-2015 budget.

Although the administration and school board members have fashioned what they hope is a fiscally responsible projection, several unknowns remain.

"The good news is we could be in good shape by the time this is done,' Superintendent Steve Gast told board members, "but for now we just don't know. There are a number of questions we can't answer.'

Among those questions is the Base Student Allocation (BSA), which is the amount of money per enrolled child, that each district receives from the State of Alaska.

While the BSA is expected to increase from it's current amount of $5,680, the actual amount depends on current legislative activity. The district is basing next year's funding on 700 students, and Gast expects the state to raise the BSA at least $85 per student. Another revenue source the district would like to be able to count on but can't until legislative action is taken is the governor's "one time funding" amount.

The governor customarily assigns monies to capital improvement projects on which the district relies to ad-

Dear Editor:

"Another Bridge to Nowhere?"

Some time back, quite a furor was raised over a proposed and expensive Alaskan Bridge to Nowhere! With the current state of affairs in government these days, and the inability of our politicians to get anything of a constructive nature done, maybe we should also refer to those bridges that span the Potomac River at Washington, D.C. as also being "Bridges to Nowhere?" H. Rick Tavares

Campo, California, 91906

Hi Nancy:

I get the opportunity to read your wonderful paper second hand from my friends Joe and Nell Martin here in Wisconsin. They tell me you know them as they lived in Alaska for quite a few years where they taught school. We belong to the same church and that's where I receive their hand-me-down Nome

Nugget. Joe knows I'm fascinated with Alaska, so we talk about your wonderful state just about every week. I enjoy watching reality shows such as Survival Alaska and Alaskan State Troopers (not sure how real they are). I also enjoy following the annual Iditarod, so when Dallas Seavey won this year's event, I jumped for joy. His name wasn't even mentioned in the stories around here, so I thought he was so far behind, he was irrelevant. Watching him in Survival Alaska, it's no surprise he came from behind to win. Congratulations Dallas.

The other thing I'd like to mention is your lack of snow for the Iditarod. We had more than enough this winter In Wisconsin along with bitter cold temperatures. I would have been happy to send you three or four feet for the race.

Keep up the good work with The Nome Nugget. It reminds me a lot of my newspaper, The Marion Adver— tiser. Local news, lots of pictures and enough ads to support the paper.

Oh, and one last thing . . . you know you're reading the Nugget when you see a recipe for moose stir-fry.

Ulu News

Sen. Donald Olson Fiscal Situation

We are in the second straight year of deficit spending. In other words, the State of Alaska is spending more than it is taking in. We have a huge unfunded liability that is associated with our retirement systems and an operating budget that has grown every year for the past decade. We also have declining throughput in the pipeline. Our saving grace in this whole situation is the high price of oil and the Legislature's decision to deposit huge amounts of money into our savings accounts. So we have some flush savings accounts right now, but current projections say if we keep spending at current levels, that savings ($17 billion) will be gone by 2023.

I'm not trying to say that it's all doom and gloom, but you should know that legislators are making their decisions with all this in mind. And if they are not, they should be. We need to be careful and thoughtful when we spend our savings and all Alaskans need to be prepared for smaller capital budgets in the near future. Having said all of this, I am against KABATA and the Susitna-Watana Dam. We need to set aside some of the mega-projects the state is pursuing. It is time to re-evaluate our priorities as a state. Our fiscal situation demands it.

Family Addition

We are happy to announce while the silver salmon are running this summer, my wife Willow will be having a baby boy and we plan to name him Solomon. Brothers Junior and Martin and sister Maggie look forward to having another little brother.

Senate Bill 138

This is a huge project. It's estimated to be the largest project in the world at a cost approaching $65 billion. There is some uncertainty with numbers so big and we are taking a leap of faith here. But there are two reasons I did vote for the bill recently and they are:

Will History Repeat Itself?

We can learn from the past and if we are smart we won't repeat our mistakes. We have been practicing disaster preparedness this past week and although most of us are too young to remember the Good Friday earthquake of 1964 many of our friends, parents and grand-parents remember the fear and the loss from 50 years ago.

What have we learned? Are we building on unstable ground? On

What have we learned? Are we building on unstable ground? On flood plains? On fault lines? Do we have emergency evacuation plans? Do we have emergency supplies? Do we think things happen to someone else, but will never happen to us? Do we remember the Exxon Valdez oil spill in Prince William Sound? Many of us are not too young to recall the scenes of dying seals. Dead whales, sea otters coated in crude oil tore at our hearts. We cried at the birds, blackened and weighted down in oil so thick they could not fly, but only flop in pools of goop. It was the worst spill ever. One big oil tanker hit a rock and it was all over.

Will these types of events be preventable in the future? Are we letting the images of disaster evaporate from our memories? Are we prepared to learn from history and not make critical and complaisant mistakes when dealing with the forces of Mother Nature? Are we stewards of our land? Are we prepared to practice the lessons from history and will we cherish the beautiful aspects of living in such a pristine glory that is our Alaska? —N.L.M.—

John Kerry warns of catastrophic costs if no action is taken

The Hill reports the release of a United Nations report detailing the pervasive effects of climate change should serve as a call to action for the world's nations to curb the emission of greenhouse gases, Secretary of State John Kerry argued Sunday night. In a statement issued by the State Department, Kerry called denial of climate change science "malpractice" and warned the "costs of inaction are catastrophic.'

"Read this report and you can't deny the reality: Unless we act dramatically and quickly, science tells us our climate and our way of life are literally in jeopardy," Kerry said.

The document, issued by the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, found that the sweeping effects of climate change were affecting every part of the globe.

The group of Nobel Prize-winning scientists warned that unless countries act quickly to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, the rising sea would devastate costal areas, the world would suffer from widespread hunger due to droughts or flooding, and extreme storms could threaten infrastructure and emergency serv-

The 32-volume report warned that the United States was likely to see massive wildfires, while killer heat waves in Europe and sever droughts in Australia would threaten both human life and agriculture. It predicts poverty, sickness and violence will spike as weather events become more extreme.

The White House also commented via a statement from science and technology czar John Holdren, who said the report "highlights the widespread and substantial observed impacts of climate change, and its growing adverse effects on livelihoods, ecosystems, economies, and human health."

The release of the report comes just days after the White House announced it was ordering federal agencies to take steps to cut methane emissions across the country. The Environmental Protection Agency is expected to develop a series of rules that would impose restrictions on hydraulic fractured oil wells, landfills and the natural gas industry. The Energy Department, Department of Agriculture and Bureau of Land Management will also propose updated regulations for coalmines, dairy farms and other methane pro-

Republican lawmakers have been critical in the past of administration efforts to regulate methane, with Sen. David Vitter (R-La.) accusing the EPA of "a witch hunt to shut down hydraulic fracking.'

Supreme Court rejects review of Katie John case

On Monday, the Supreme Court of the United States decided to reject the State of Alaska's petition in the legal case State of Alaska vs. Sally Jewell, Secretary of the United States Department of Interior et al, widely known as one of the Katie John cases.

Governor Parnell's lawsuit asked the Court to overturn the federal rules promulgated in 1999 that include waters subject to the federal reserved water rights doctrine in the definition of public lands in Title VIII of ANILĈA. The federal rules provide a subsistence priority during times of shortage for rural Alaskans.

The Court's rejection of the State's appeal marks the end to nearly 27 years of litigation by the Native American Rights Fund on behalf of Ahtna elder, Katie John of Mentasta. The Katie John cases exemplified the contentious battle waged between federal, tribal and state interests over jurisdiction of Alaska Native subsistence fishing rights.

In the first Katie John lawsuit, NARF established that ANILCA's subsistence priority applies to those navigable waters in which the United States owns so called "reserved water rights," or about 60 percent of Alaska's inland waters.

In 2005, the State of Alaska filed another lawsuit challenging the federal agency final rule implementing Katie John I. Representing Katie John again, NARF brought a counter lawsuit and argued that the regulations did not go far enough but should have extended to Alaska Native allotments and upstream and downstream waters.

In July 2013, the Ninth Circuit ruled in favor of the federal government and held that the Secretaries appropriately used notice-and-comment rulemaking, rather than adjudication, to identify those waters that are "public lands" for the purpose of determining the scope of the Act's rural subsistence policy. The panel held that it was reasonable that the "public lands" subject to ANILCA's rural subsistence priority included the waters within and adjacent to federal reservations; and that reserved water rights for Alaska Native Settlement allotments were best determined on a case-by-case basis.

Katie John did not live long enough to see the completion of the litigation as she died at age 97 in the summer of 2013. Katie's granddaughter, Kathryn Martin, expressed relief that the ruling would stand and stated, "Praise the Lord, my grandma can rest in peace."

"We are very pleased with the Supreme Court's wise decision to uphold the rulings of the lower courts," said AFN Co-chair Tara Sweeney. "This is not only a victory for Katie John and her family, for Alaska Natives and other rural Alaskans who depend on subsistence to feed their families, but for all Alaskans who seek a prosperous, fair and equitable society.

Senator Mark Begich issued a statement that said, "This is a huge victory for the heroic Katie John, her family and the entire Alaska Native community. Throughout Alaska's rural communities, subsistence hunting and fishing remains essential to the cultural and physical wellbeing for thousands of Alaskans and I'm committed to protecting that right."

Alaska back to Russia?

The Washington Times reports that a petition that seeks to put Alaska back under Russian control has garnered more than 18,000 signatures in just a few days — about a fifth of what's needed to capture a formal White House look.

The petition, called "Alaska Back to Russia," was created by a resident of Anchorage who declined to list his name, but instead gave only the ini-

Agencies tested Alaska tsunami warning system

There are a few things people in Nome can depend on. One of them is the emergency siren going off daily at noon. Last Thursday, however, the siren rang at 10:15 a.m. as part of a statewide test of the Alaska Tsunami warning system.

The Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management, National Weather Service and the Alaska Tsunami Warning Center, cooperated with local emergency management offices and the Alaska Broadcasters Association conducted a live code test of the Tsunami Warning System. In addition to the monthly tests of the Emergency Alert

System, the once yearly live code test ensures the system is ready to broadcast time sensitive tsunami and other emergency messages.

Jeremy Zidek with the Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management said in a press release that the test was part of Tsunami Preparedness Week, proclaimed by Gov. Sean Parnell lasting from March 23 through 29. The week coincides with the anniversary of the Good Friday Earthquake, the devastating 9.2 magnitude earthquake that triggered deadly tsunamis in Alaska on Good Friday, March 27, 1964.

"As we commemorate the 50th Anniversary of the 1964 Great Alaska Earthquake we test our ability to alert Alaskans about a tsunami threat," said Mike O'Hare, Deputy Director of DHS&EM. "The EAS partnership has invested in new technologies that enable us to target our emergency messages to regions that are susceptible to the specific threat. Like previous years, the ability to identify issues and make corrections is the purpose of the exercise.

NAVY to break down ice camp at Prudhoe Bay

The NAVY Commander of Submarine Forces announced an early end to Ice Camp Nautilus on March 23. The ice camp was a temporary structure built and operated especially for Ice Exercise 2014. Personnel at Ice Camp Nautilus, which was built into the ice floe north of Prudhoe Bay, began a careful breakdown of the camp.

ICEX-2014 began March 17 and was scheduled to continue through March 30. However, large shifts in wind direction created instabilities in the wind-driven ice floes of the Arctic Ocean, and these changes in the prevailing winds between March 18 and March 20 led to multiple fractures in the ice near the camp. These cracks prevented the use of several airfields used for transporting personnel and equipment to the ice camp. The rapidly changing conditions of the ice, along with extremely low temperatures and poor visibility hampered helicopter operations and made sustaining the runway potentially risky.

The Virginia-class attack submarine USS New Mexico and the Los Angeles-class attack submarine USS Hampton will continue to gather data and conduct ice-related exercises until they transit out from under the ice.

have conducted Submarines under-ice operations in the Arctic regions in support of inter-fleet transit, training, cooperative allied engagements and operations for more than 50 years. USS Nautilus made the first submerged transit to the North Pole in 1958. USS Skate was the first U.S. submarine to surface through Arctic ice at the North Pole in March 1959. Since those events, the U.S. Submarine Force has completed more than 120 Arctic exercises with the last being conducted in 2012. The last ice camp was established in 2011.

Network news climate change stories rarely report both impact, action

When it involves climate change coverage, viewers don't always get the complete picture from U.S. network television, according to a University of Michigan study

Major networks - ABC, CBS and NBC—show the impact or actions taken in climate change stories, but rarely combine the components in the same broadcast to give viewers better coverage, the study shows.

"When information about the threat that climate change poses is not paired with solutions on what can be done in response, individuals may ignore climate messages and be less likely to engage in political action on the issue," said Sol Hart, University of Michigan assistant professor in the Department of Communication Studies and the Program in the Environment. Hart and colleague Lauren Feldman, an assistant professor at Rutgers University, reviewed 440 network news transcripts about global climate change during a six-year period ending in 2011. Overall, 60 percent of the broadcasts mentioned the impact of climate change and 59 percent discussed actions that could be taken to address the issue. About 23 percent of the broadcasts discussed both effects and actions together.

Nearly 54 percent of all broadcasts discussed climate change impacts using an environmental frame. 13 percent focused on public health, another 13 percent emphasized economic impact and 8 percent involved national security.

Also, actions to address climate change are most often framed in terms of conflict between politicians and stakeholders on whether to implement an action, rather than how actions may help reduce greenhouse gas emissions, the researchers said.

Japan ordered to stop Antarctic whaling

The Huffington Post reports that the International Court of Justice in The Hague on Monday ordered a temporary halt to Japan's Antarctic whaling program, ruling that it is not for scientific purposes as the Japanese had claimed.

Australia had sued Japan at the U.N.'s highest court for resolving disputes between nations in hopes of ending whaling in the icy Southern Reading a 12-4 decision by the court's 16-judge panel, Presiding Judge Peter Tomka of Slovakia said Japan's program failed to justify the large number of minke whales it takes under its current Antarctic program, while failing to meet much smaller targets for fin and humpback whales. "The evidence does not establish that the program's design and implementation are reasonable in relation to achieving its stated objectives," the judge said. The judge noted that Japan had not considered a smaller program or non-lethal methods to study whale populations, and that it cited only two peer-reviewed scientific papers relating to its program from 2005 to the present. In this time Japanese whalers harpooned 3,600 minke whales and a handful of fin whales.

The court ordered Japan to halt any issuing of whaling permits until the program has been revamped.

age over a whole month.
"We could just sit here and be at the mercy of the oil companies and just hope they are going to lower costs," NJUS Board Chairwoman Berda Willson said in approving the contract resolution.

After vet another rehash over a 20-year commitment to pay a set price per kilowatt come hell, high water or a cheaper power source in the meantime, Nome's elected representatives have OK'd a negotiated power purchase contract with Pilgrim Geothermal LLC, based in Washington state.

Nome Joint Utility Systems Board and Nome Common Council members voted unanimously at a joint meeting March 27 to buy up to two megawatts of geothermal power from Pilgrim Geothermal at 25 cents a kilowatt during the 20-year contract with a an opportunity to negotiate an extension. Over a year at two-megawatt flow capacity, NJUS would buy 17,500,000 kilowatts at a cost of $3,718,750. The 20-year clock starts ticking when the new facility at Pilgrim Hot Springs begins production and the geothermal power starts flowing into town.

It is a sweet deal, Fred Moody,

NJUS board member, said after going over issues at the meeting.

He had to be convinced.

"I was dead set against it, until I read the contract," he said. According to the agreement, developers will take on the risk and the expense of infrastructure, including building the generators at Pilgrim Hot Springs and a 60-mile transmission line to get the juice to town."

Renewable energy is not bubbling out of the ground at full potential,

"Efforts at Pilgrim didn't stop last night," John K. Handeland, NJUS utility manager said March 28, the day after the vote. "There is lots of work to be done by the developer, but giving us reasonable assurance that they can pull this off, triggers our time line to be sure we are ready for integration.'

Now that an agreement has been reached, work will continue this month to find the exact source of the hot water to measure the temperature and flow. Up to March 27, developers made it perfectly clear that without a deal to sell power over the 20 years to recover their expenses, they would abandon the project, unwilling to invest further capital re-

DREDGING SNAKE RIVER— Work has begun to deepen the Snake River to minus four feet depth.

Snake River dredged

By Diana Haecker

In preparation for another busy summer at the Nome Port and small boat harbor, work has begun on dredging the Snake River area where gold mining dredges park to a depth of minus four feet.

Harbormaster Lucas Stotts said that Coastline Construction, a subcontractor to Pacific Pile & Marine, began last week to excavate material out of the mudflats.

'This will allow more dredgers to park there," said Stotts.

The river is still frozen, so heavy excavators can use the ice platform to dig into the river and remove the material, which is trucked to a city facility near the upland storage facil-

Stotts said this would allow the city to use the excavated material as fill in the future.

Stotts expects the excavating activities to go on for one to two weeks, maximum.

VFW club and bar temporarily closed

By Diana Haecker

The VFW clubhouse and bar closed last week, due to a lack of patrons to keep the place busy and economically viable. Senior Vice Commander of the VFW Post 9569 Stan Andersen said the bar is going to be temporarily closed until further notice. "We've been losing money for the past five years," said Andersen. "It's not worth keeping open for two or three people coming in."

The VFW bar operates under a club license and only VFW members and their guests are allowed in the club. Andersen said the VFW Post 9569 has 78 members, most of whom are not living in Nome. There are only 36 VFW members still living in Nome, according to Andersen.

Schoolboard

In order to balance the budget, the district has removed some line item capital improvement projects until they know there will be funding available.

Each year the school district requests money from the City of Nome, the amount of which is based on funding the City receives from the state. The City's funding is based on the current mill rate, which has been at 11 Mills since 2012. The City, in turn, is required to allocate a portion of its funding (2.65 Mills) to the school district. After some review of past amounts and current needs, the board decided to ask for the maximum amount allowed from the City, plus an additional contribution, which would equal the requested percentage from last year's Anvil City Science Academy is adding a teacher to accommo more students, for a total enrollment of 60 students. Other changes in district personnel include two reductions in certified staff and two reductions in classified staff.

Nome Elementary principal Bob Grimes helped to clarify the jump in software licensing costs that was added to next year's costs. The fees are associated with two programs the elementary school utilizes, Reading Mastery and Achieve 3000. "It's not a piece of software you install on a computer," Grimes explained, "it's a program we use in the school; it's like a text book fee but it's technological. Last year we received some free from the manufacturer, but now we've got to pay Grimes added that the instructional programs are well used at the school, and "these programs are trackable, we can see the [students'] progress." Upgrades to computers and technology equipment are also included in next year's spending. "There is, without question, the need this year to update the laptop carts,' Gast told the board when they reviewed a big hike it technology and equipment.

The board will meet again on April 8 to review the budget figures.

sources. What they know now from drilling and research makes drillers and scholars confident that the water volume and temperature would support a two-megawatt flow, maybe more.

A megawatt equals 1,000 kilowatts. Nome currently needs an average of two megawatts in the summer and five-and-a-half to six megawatts in the winter to feed electrical needs, according to John K. Handeland, NJUS manager.

The exploratory drilling program has drawn support from U.S. Dept. of Energy, University of Alaska, City of Nome, and NJUS, as well as contributions from Nome Chamber of Commerce, and Native corporations. NJUS will take delivery of the geothermal power at a transformer at the terminus of NJUS' transmission line at the Rock Creek Mine near Nome. NJUS will pay Pilgrim Geothermal 22 cents per kwh, and in addition, 4 cents will go to the owners of the hot springs, Unaatuq, LLC. For use of its connection at Rock Creek, NJUS will receive 1 cent per kilowatt, bringing the cost to a quarter per kilowatt.

Pilgrim Limited would build and maintain the transmission line as well as the infrastructure at Pilgrim Hot Springs.

Currently, the diesel fuel needed to generate a kilowatt costs 21.25 cents. That's figuring from an efficiency of 16 kwh generated per gallon at $3.40 per gallon using annual totals. Carl Emmons, NJUS board member who voted to approve the contract, had a concern. "The price of a kilowatt just went up five cents in Nome, Alaska," Emmons said.

Not necessarily so, John Handeland replied when quizzed last week.

The cost—21.25 cents—per kilowatt for diesel-generated power quotes just the cost of the fuel. Although other costs will be spread across all forms of NJUS power sources on electric bills, including wind generation at Banner Ridge, some of these costs are special only to fuel generation. The geothermal power, arriving ready to use, would diminish some of the costs of the fuel-generated power.

For instance, the geothermal kilowatts will decrease the frequency of generator checkups due in the range of 300,000 to 500,000 kilowatts at a cost of $20,000 each. Replacement of diesel-generated kilowatts would mean fewer gallons of fuel purchased along with a reduction in fuel wharfage costs of about $44,344 at Port of Nome, as well as decreased transportation costs, less wear and tear on diesel equipment, storage and maintenance.

"It will mean less fighting the maintenance nightmare at the tank farm where melting permafrost threatens to destabilize the tanks' Handeland said.

"25 cents has the potential of curtailing any other technology," Emmons said. "Do we not invest in a battery to take all the wind turbine energy? Things are developing rap-

Technology does change in time, Handeland conceded. "Maybe by the time the gas line comes on line, we may have a man on Mars. You just don't know," Handeland said.

One of the next big projects on the workbench for NJUS, according to Handeland, is getting the money together to purchase battery storage for the wind farm to store excess energy from windy periods for use during periods of calm.

"Adding the battery is the next thing on the list," he said. "It is like having multicolored Easter eggs in a basket-some are big, some are small. The challenge is to have the basket the right size.

Emmons said signing the 20-year contract was gambling. "You're betting the public's money on the price of oil going up."

Moody did not let that pass. "You're betting on the price of energy going down," he told Emmons. Next, Handeland had a say. "We have few options: Wind-yes, we can make it more efficient with time and experience. Geothermal is the next most likely resource to take us off oil. The gas pipeline is years

Councilman Randy Pomeranz was ready for any resource that would possibly lower his utility bills. "My utility bills used to be less than my mortgage payment. Now they are 50 percent higher than the mortgage payment," Pomeranz said. "I'm in favor of this agreement at this point."

"When the geothermal resource starts to produce, Nome will be lighting homes from a basket of sources-geothermal, wind and diesel fuel. We need to get maximum benefit from renewable resources," Handeland said. "We need to take and integrate all these technologies for maximum efficiencies.

Wind generation has already been added to Nome's utility picture. An initial development by Banner Wind LLC has been in production for nearly five years. In 2013, NJUS added two 900 kwh generators using money from Alaska Energy Authority and Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. Next New Years Day, NJUS will assume operational control and flexibility to reconfigure Banner Wind assets under a land use agreement.

Throughout recent discussions, all sides have made it clear that the power from Pilgrim Hot Springs would go nonstop across the transmission line to join the NJUS grid at Rock Creek Mine, with no drop lines to supply camps and rural property along the way—no distribution lines.

Consumer Derrick Leedy had a question about this, but arrived after public comment time at the March 27 meeting.

'We are doing business now," acting chair of the meeting, Councilman Stan Andersen told Leedy when he wanted to speak later in the agenda.

Contacted after the meeting, Leedy said his question concerned the possibility of customers along the transmission line getting a drop line by paying for required step-down transformers and other expenses.

"This is a 69,000 volt line. The transformers would be in the $10,000 range. To drop a line for a few kwh for camp use during the summer would not be feasible," Handeland said Monday. If a subdivision developed where there would be many customers to share the cost of the line extension could be a possibility, he said.

Leedy also wanted to know about the route the line would run to Rock Creek. That issue was under study and in negotiation with landowners. Handeland said. The route is currently unknown. He said it would take off somewhere near Basin Creek to go to a transformer at Rock Creek Mine. Developers at Pilgrim Hot Springs hope to get the geothermal energy flowing by the end of 2015 at the latest.

At the joint meeting of the Council and NJUS March 27, NJUS board members voted unanimously to recommend the Council sign the con-

Then the Council voted unanimously to approve the contract and to put further work in motion to isolate the power source at Pilgrim Hot Springs so Nome can continue replacing diesel energy with renewable geothermal energy.

• Legislation opposes MOU

state of Alaska or its government regarding possible impacts on fish and game resources, oil and gas development or mining opportunities in those proposed regions."

Nome resident Guy Martin serves on the Beringia Panel that guides funding decisions for projects under the auspices of the National Park Services' Shared Beringian Heritage Program, the overarching NPS program that includes the creation of the transboundary park.

Martin said that he could not agree with Senator Giessel's statement that the MOU has advanced "quietly" and without Alaskans' input. "I don't agree with it. When there were statements made, that it was done quietly, it's not true," Martin said.

He added that both Bering Straits Native Corporation and Kawerak Inc. were repeatedly consulted and have voiced the opinion that they would not support a MOU between the US and Russia unless there was language included that ensured that Native Chukotkans could continue subsistence hunting and fishing. "We still have our relatives over there and the final word from Kawerak and BSNC was that they would not support an MOU unless our relatives on other side had some say in subsistence in hunting and fishing," said Martin.

In an email exchange with The Nome Nugget, Senator Giessel wrote "while there have been some meetings hosted by the National Park Service in northwest Alaska, we don't see that as asking for input from the rest of Alaskans or leaders in state government on an ongoing basis. This is the feds and the international community coming in to Alaska and designating and creating areas without full discussion by the Legislature or Congress."

Giessel opined that the federal government "has plenty of land and 'designating' more, even if just for 'cultural bonding' and collaboration is unnecessary. They are already collaborating and sharing their cultures without having to have an additional federal or UNESCO program involved."

National Park Service Shared Beringian Program manager Janis Kozlowski was surprised when the resolution surfaced. "The resolution is not completely based on facts," Kozlowski said. Countering the allegation that the MOU was done quietly and without local input, she said, "We've always looked for local support every step of the way."

She points to contact logs she kept since September 2010, which list multiple meetings with State of Alaska government officials from the Governor's office, the Alaska Dept. of Commerce and Economic Development, Kawerak, BSNC and the creation of the Beringia Working group, consisting of Bering Strait representative Matt Ganley, Walter Sampson of the NANA region, also interviews on several radio stations and newspaper articles and full page Beringia advertisements.

SJR 15 maintains that during the past two decades, the NPS has repeatedly expanded the size of the area identified as Beringia. Kozlowski disagrees and said that while the Shared Beringian Heritage program has funded several projects in the area, there has been no effort, or attempt, to expand the definition of the area known as "Beringia."

The Resolution plays on the fears that the federal government via the symbolic linkage of National Parks would hamper resource development

The Resolution reads "the international designations contemplated by the National Park Service for the areas included in Beringia are an invitation and another means for United States and foreign environmental nongovernmental organizations to oppose resource development on public and Alaska Native land and water in the state."

However, the MOU does not contain language suggesting opposition to resource development and has no effect on existing laws and regulations

Giessel argues that the Izembek road is a prime example and points to the continued federal-state conflict over having a road built to King Cove which would require a land exchange. "It was an international Ramsar site designated long ago and one of the criteria used to deny the people of that area a life-saving road through the area. In that situation the black-headed brandt [sic] and fields of eelgrass are of more importance than human lives," she said.

Giessel also used as an argument that mine development worldwide encounters opposition. "Throughout the US and the world, international designations hamper resource development: The New World Mine in Montana was impeded, a uranium mine near Kakadu National Park in Australia was picketed and harassed, the Aginskoye Mine in Russia was sabotaged by environmentalists immediately following the designation of the Volcanoes of Kamchatka World Heritage Site; the Rosia Montana Mine in Romania suffered the same misconceived opposition. The Appalachian coal fields were harassed by opposers who actually invited the United Nations to intervene even when there was no international site designation in the area," Giessel

When asked about the basis for the Resolution's claim that more Alaska land would be designated as an international park and that an additional layer of federal bureaucracy and regulation would be created, Senator Giessel responded that the MOU is not what it seems. "We believe that the MOU is just the camel's nose under the tent." She said that UNESCO could designate any areas throughout the world with no collaboration with the affected area's governing bodies. "SJR 15 would not permit any new designations without consideration by both the state and the federal government.

"Hypothetically, if there was an international park designation made, there could be multiple issues for permitting or transportation for resource development projects in that area. There would be the National Parks to deal with and the international community through UNESCO if a project collided with the mission of the projected area. Years back, it took an act of Congress to get the Red Dog Mine Road built through federal lands."

The Resolution also states that the creation of a transboundary area "would be the first step in imposing international designations and would reduce the sovereignty of the state and the United States over the burdened parts of the state, in violation of the Alaska Statehood Compact, the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act and the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act."

The actual MOU does not affect sovereign rights of either side. The MOU states that the "this legally nonbinding Memorandum is not an international agreement and does not create any rights or obligations under international law." It also says "nothing in this Memorandum abrogates or in any way infringes upon the sovereign rights and authorities of each of the Governments and their Participants to manage lands within its respective borders in accordance with its country's laws, or upon the rights of third parties."

The resolution also maintains "US Dept of State and the National Park Service have traveled throughout Russia and spoken before the Russian Duma in Moscow." Shared Beringian Heritage program manager Janis Kozlowski told the Nome Nugget that while the U.S. State Department did send a Deputy Assistant Secretary to Moscow on several occasions to discuss the MOU with colleagues at the Ministry of Natural Resources in Moscow, no one has spoken to members of the Duma in Moscow.

The resolution calls for the Alaska State Legislature to "urge the governor and the attorney general to reserve all legal remedies, including the recovery of damages, for a taking of the natural resources of the state in violation of the Alaska Statehood Compact, should a designation of land and water in the state as an international park, world heritage site, biosphere reserve, Ramsar site or other classification hamper the use or development of the natural resources of the state."

In defense of the strong language used in the resolution, threatening legal action, Senator Giessel wrote that "Alaska continues to have the federal government, and possibly the United Nations, making decision in and for Alaska that are not necessarily in the best interests of the state, WITHOUT our consideration. We have a good track record of responsible land management in Alaska, why does the federal government think we need help and why do they insist on involving themselves on our lands?"

She conceded that there are very good reasons to support the cultural and sociological bonds between the peoples of the Beringia area. "We can support that, however we do not believe we need to initiate formal memorandums and heads of state summits to accomplish this bonding and sharing of culture. And if we do, then everyone, including the Legislature and the federal government should be invited to the conversation at the get-go. This is the reasoning behind SJR 15," Giessel stated.

Senator Donny Olson voted for the resolution and is also against further designation of lands towards an international Park. In an email exchange with the Nome Nugget, Sen. Olson wrote, "International land designations, in general, don't sit well with me. In my opinion, the state and individual Alaskans currently don't own enough land in Alaska. The federal government is the largest landowner in Alaska with 60 percent of the total area (222 million acres). This acreage includes national parks, wildlife refuges, national forests. military reservations and the North Slope National Petroleum Reserve. More than a dozen federal agencies manage federal lands in Alaska. We have enough federal agencies affecting the lives of Alaskans and I don't want an international agency doing so either.'

However, NPS officials dispute that more lands would be designated. According to Kozlowski, the United States plans to contribute two existing parks, namely the Bering Land Bridge National Preserve and Cape Krusenstern National Monument. "No new lands on the U.S. side will be designated or included in the agreement," wrote Kozlowski. "The Russians will contribute land in Chukotka totaling about 4 million acres."

On January 17, 2013, Russian Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev signed a decree creating the Russian National Park "Beringia," in the Russian North East region of Chukotka.

Part of the disagreement also comes from the wording chosen by the National Park Service calling the Beringia transboundary park an "International Protected Area." Although the goal of the overarching Shared Beringian Heritage Program is an international agreement to generate stronger ties and more opportunities for residents on both sides, the verbiage of a "protected area" conjures up images of locking up resources, creating access issues and piling on layers of federal bureaucracy. However, this seems to be not the case.

In a letter to U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski, United States Department of State legislative affairs secretary Julia Frifield wrote that the MOU is not legally binding and would not create any rights of obligations under international law. "Accordingly, it would not abrogate or infringe upon the sovereign rights and authorities of either government to manage lands within its respective borders in accordance with its country's laws, or upon the rights of third parties," the letter said.

Senator Olson added that the people who live on both sides of the Bering Strait are interconnected by language, culture and traditions. "This connection should be encouraged and cherished and I don't believe that an international park would do anything to advance this," Olson wrote.

The Resolution passed the Senate unanimously. It was moved to the House, where it was referred to the House Rules Committee. As of Monday, it was not scheduled to be discussed any time soon.

Representative Neal Foster, D-House District 39, has not taken a position on the Resolution yet. His Chief of Staff Paul Labolle said in an email exchange with the Nome Nugget that Rep. Foster "is still waiting to hear debate on this so he can look at all the pros and cons."

The impact of the Legislature's Resolution is difficult to predict, said Kozlowski. "We had a lengthy, fouryear relationship with the legislature, State of Alaska, NGO's, corporations and local stakeholders centered around this issue." Kozlowski maintained that the Shared Beringian Heritage program has listened to and understood local concerns and tried to address them. She said, "There is a lot of local support for an international designation in Beringia and it would be unfortunate if the legislature's action were to sway public opinion from this important initiative. The agreement carries with it the opportunity and possibility for stronger connections between the US and Russia - particularly for the people of the Seward Peninsula and Chukotka - an outcome not assured, but expected, of this peaceful, non-binding initiative that people in the region have waited for since the cold war.

As part of an educational program to teach students lessons steeped in real life experiences of mushers, Kotzebue musher Chuck Schaeffer, along with team mates from Beringia Racing, Norwegian musher Joar Leifseth Ulsom and Chukotkan exchange musher Timofei Gynutegin of Lorino, Russia were ready to head out on two Bering Air planes for Provideniya on Monday, but were held up due to weather on the Russian side until Tuesday.

They will participate in the 2014 Nadezdha Hope sled dog race, a 700-mile stage race along the Chukotkan coastline from Providenja to Uelen.

Mushers Miriam Osredkar and Yvonne Dabakk of Germany also participate in the Hope race.

On the tarmac, two Bering Air planes waited to be loaded with five sled dog teams, sleds, bags, dog boxes, snowmachine sleds and the mushers' gear. Although weather was picture perfect in Nome, the pilots were waiting on more promising weather updates from the Russian side. The flights were delayed on Monday, but weather looked more promising on Tuesday afternoon.

The mushers waited patiently inside the cargo office, snacking on pizza and sipping sodas. Mille Porsild handed out their passports stamped with Russian visas.

Porsild is the educational mastermind behind Racing Beringia. She participated in the Hope race years ago and - having been bitten by the mushing bug - she uses sled dogs and their drivers as educational tools to bring meaningful curricula to school kids nationwide.

"Team Beringia is the spring board of lessons our curriculum teaches," Porsild said. "The adventures of the trail are embedded in the lessons, providing the context."

The curriculum is designed for K-8th grade and is taught in 3,800 schools across the nation, including Alaska.

Porsild said she has used sled dogs as a platform to teach science and other subjects since 1999.

"This year, we pose lots of research questions around the term 'adaptation.'" she said. "For example, how does our environment adapt to change, how do our cultures adapt to the environment and what does that mean for our culture and our

The Nadezdha race had its beginnings in 1991. After the Iron Curtain fell, efforts were made to bridge the two continents, whose closest neighbors on the Chukotkan and Alaskan side were united by a shared culture.

The race was called "Nadezdha," meaning "hope" in English.

Dog teams from Chukotka, Japan, Switzerland, Canada, Norway and the USA raced from Nome to Wales. From Wales, they were flown across the Bering Strait to restart the race in Uelen with a finish in Anadyr.

Nome's Kate Persons won this inaugural Hope race.

Although part of the race's purpose is to create an exchange between Chukotka and Alaska, no Inupiaq musher has participated in the Hope race until now.

Schaeffer, the first Inupiaq to participate, rounds out team Beringia Racing, with Norwegian Joar Leifseth Ulsom and Chukotkan marine mammal hunter Mikhail Telpin. Telpin last year finished the Yukon Quest and the Iditarod Trail Sled Dog

Young Timofei has spent this winter in Alaska training his own dog team under the guidance of experienced Alaskan mushers.

Porsild's educational endeavor is supported by the National Park Service and its Shared Beringian Heritage Program.

Liz Shea, project manager with the Shared Beringian Heritage Program said that they don't fund the mushers, only the educational component to Team Beringia. Shea said the project meets the goals of the National Park Service's Bering Land Bridge National Preserve and the Beringia Shared Heritage Program. Part of its mission is to "recognize and celebrate the contemporary and historic exchange of biological resources and cultural heritage shared by Russia and the United States on both sides of the Bering Strait."

Shea said the purpose is to get exposure for an ancient mode of transportation that is still practiced today on both sides of the Bering Strait.

Schaeffer, his wife Tracey and their daughter lived about 30 miles outside of Kotzebue, with their dogs and a couple of Icelandic ponies.

They relocated to Willow a few years ago.

Schaeffer and his dogs have had many adventures off the beaten path, including mushing his sled dogs from Nenana to Kotzebue in the last two years, to get them to the start of the Kobuk 440.

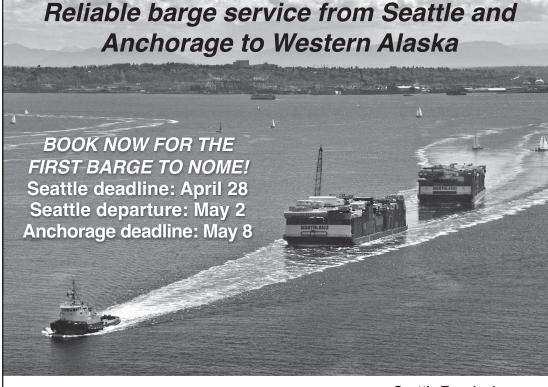

This year, he'll be racing Chukotkans on their turf.

"I'm not going into this for racing, but I'm really curious how they live there," Schaeffer said. "I'm so excited. It's a once in a lifetime experience."

He said he's going into this a little bit blind. "It's gonna be another adventure for Chuck," he chuckled.

Schaeffer took nine dogs, one sled, survival gear, a couple rolls of spare runner plastic and no food. "I want to travel as light as possible," he explained. The race is set up as a stage race as\ mushers travel from village to village. Humans and dogs are provided with food. Schaeffer banks on getting walrus and seal meat for his dogs over there.

The race is slated to begin April 5. Schaeffer said he still needs some help to cover the expenses for the trip. His wife Tracey set up a fundraising mechanism on their Iviq Adventures Facebook page.

OFF THEY GO— The first wave of high school girls are off in the 27th annual rural state ski and biathlon championship's 7-kilometer ski race, hosted by the Western Interior Ski Association (WISA) at Birch Hill in Fairbanks. Skiing away are Bianca Trowbridge, Nome (24), eventual meet Skimeister Rosa Schmidt, Nome (23), Alexis Hutson, Nome, Aly Daniels, Unalakleet, and Sarah Brown, Galena.

Nome's Schmidt ends high school ski career with second rural state Skimeister award

By Keith Conger

Long road trips are always a big challenge for athletes. Nome senior Rosa Schmidt, fresh off 10 days of competition at the Arctic Winter Games in Fairbanks, proved she was able to handle her road weariness by capturing her second Skimeister award at the rural state ski and biathlon championships.

After a week away, Schmidt returned to Fairbank's Birch Hill Recreation Area for the 27th annual Western Interior Ski/Biathlon Association championships, and by earning gold medals in both the 7-kilometer freestyle ski race, as well as in the 6-kilometer biathlon sprint race, was crowned the top female high school skier in rural Alaska.

Unalakleet's Daniels sisters, senior Katie, and sophomore Aly, who also competed at the AWGs the week before, took bronze and silver medals respectively in the two events

It wasn't until the relay race on the Tanana River outside of Nenana on day three, that Schmidt was bested, as Aly Daniels posted the fastest split time in the team relay race. A gold medal in the team relay by the siblings helped secure a second straight team trophy for Unalakleet.

Nome freshman Bianca Trowbridge teamed with Schmidt to give Nome the second place high school girls team trophy, while Rayna Buck-Nassuk and Anna Prentice would guide the White Mountain girls to third place.

By hitting 8 of 10 shots, Nome sophomore Alexis Hutson became the top sharpshooter in either of the high school divisions. The next highest shot total was 6. (High school division shooters are not allowed to use a rest).

Nome sixth-grader Mallory Conger topped two near-podium, fourth-place finishes by posting the second fastest relay split in the junior high girls division's (5th - 8th grades) team relay on the final day of the three-day event.

Conger teamed up with fellow sixth-grader Maya Kralik to take the bronze team relay medal. Kralik, sixth-grader Shayna Warnke-Green, and sixth-grader Anna Peterson all cracked the WISA championships Top10 for the first time during the meet, helping Nome take the third place team trophy.

Eighth-grader Kiana Korta from Galena captured her first junior high Skimeister Award by winning the 5-kilometer ski race, taking second place in the 6-kilometer biathlon race, and by posting the fastest split in the team relay. She and eighth-grade teammate Jesslyn West, winner of the biathlon race, took first place in the team relay as well as the first place junior high girls team trophy.

White Mountain sixth-grader Jenny Hanson, who won silver in the ski race and bronze in the biathlon, teamed up with seventh-grader Felicia Ione to take silver medals in the relay, as well as second place in team standings

Two more AWGs participants, sophomore Kaleb Korta and Junior Isaac McElwee, both of Galena, placed first and second respectively in each of the two individual events. Their gold medal effort in the team relay helped secure the first place team trophy in the high school boys division for Galena.

Korta's efforts would easily bring him his fourth consecutive Skimeister Award. A victory at the 2015 WISA championships in White Mountain would tie Korta for the most awards in the history of the WISA championships, a record currently held by former Nome Ski and Biathlon racer Emerson Conger.

Nome's first year skier and biathlete Junyor Erikson relied on his established hockey skills and athleticism to power his way to a pair of fourth place finishes.

Aaron Bergamaschi and Julius Ione teamed up for the second place high school boys team trophy.

Galena capped off its domination at the meet by riding the efforts of eighth-grader Jacob Moos, who earned gold medals in both individual races. Moos had help from eighth-grade teammate Trenton Ambrose and sixth-grader teammate Daniel Kopp, in earning the junior high boys team trophy.

Moos, who was the meet's only competitor to hit 10 out of 10 shots, secured his first Skimeister Award. The young sharp shooter has not missed a single shot in WISA biathlon competition in four years, going a perfect 40 of 40 for his career.

The team from Unalakleet earned the Sportsmanship Award.

In 1986, the Western Interior Ski/Biathlon Association created an event that would allow skiers and biathletes from rural locations around the state to experience high level ski and biathlon competition. The resulting Western Interior Ski and Biathlon Championships are regarded as the rural state ski and biathlon championships.

Biathletes at WISA events stop to shoot twice around a course using 22 caliber rifles. During each shooting session the athlete takes 5 shots at 4.5 inch targets from a distance of 50 meters, and must learn to control their breathing which is obviously elevated due to the skiing. Missed shots result in short, but time consuming, penalty loops.

Hanson also received bronze in the Two Foot High Kick, fourth place in the One Foot High Kick and fifth place in the Triple Jump. He coaches at Unalakleet High School. Unalakleet athletes brought home ten medals, along with several other athletes from the Bering Strait region who returned home with medals. Apaay Campbell from Gambell set a new record in the Kneel Jump Open Women's division and won a gold medal. Apaay jumped 54 and 3/4 inches, breaking the old record of 49" set by Eleanor Matthias of Alaska in the 1992 games in Whitehorse, Yukon. Other medalists include Colin Corsetti of Unalakleet, Isaac McElwee of White Mountain and Katie Daniels of Unalakleet.

BRONZE— Nick Hanson of Unalakleet won bronze in the Two Foot High Kick. He also received four Fair Play Awards from different coaches and regions. The Fair Play Pin is produced by the Arctic Winter Games International Committee. It is distributed to athletes who demonstrate an understanding of the philosophy of the Arctic Winter Games and who exemplify the spirit of fair play during the games.

Helpful hints for filling out your Indian Exemption paperwork

The Indian Status Exemption paperwork that releases Alaska Native and American Indian people from Affordable Care Act requirements is now available. Please complete this document to avoid a tax penalty!

IMPORTANT NOTE: If you are applying for the Indian Status Exemption, you have the entire year of 2014 to submit this application. However, we suggest that you complete the exemption paperwork and mail it no later than October 1, 2014, to ensure that the federal government has enough time to process your application. We encourage you to do this as soon as possible to avoid any delays.

Helpful hints to complete the Indian Status Exemption application:

- 1) Print out exemption application at:
  - http://marketplace.cms.gov/getofficialresources/publications-and-articles/tribal-exemption.pdf
- Print an extra copy of the "Step 2" page from the application for your spouse, and each of your children or others in your family who are Alaska Native and/or American Indian. You will need to complete a separate "Step 2" page for each member of your family you claim on your taxes.
- 2) What to include with your exemption application:
- A copy of one of the following for each person you are filing for;
  - Tribal Enrollment Card or Letter
  - Proof of ANCSA (Regional or Village) Shareholder Status
  - Certificate of Indian Blood (CIB) Card issued by the Bureau of Indian Affairs
- If you don't have one of the items above, you can also visit your local Tribal clinic for a "Letter of Eligibility to Receive Care"
- Send copies only. Do not send original cards or documents. These items will not be returned.
- 3) Here is a document that provides additional instructions and helpful hints: http://anthctoday.org/aca/Indian_Status_Exemption.pdf
- 4) Keep a photocopy of the entire application and forms for your personal records.
- 5) What happens next?
- You will receive an Exemption Certificate Number from the Health Insurance Marketplace that you'll put on your federal Income tax return.
  - This is for your 2014 taxes that you will file in 2015.
  - Keep this certificate number in a safe place as it is how you will avoid the tax penalty.
- If you don't receive the certificate information, call the Health Insurance Marketplace Help Center at 1/800-318-2596.

NSHC Patient Benefits will be traveling to our surrounding villages to assist with the Tribal exemption.
